Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, the amendment to section 2 as agreed to by the conferees, I take it, is not to enlarge in any way that question, but to prevent some naval vessels or other vessels from being considered as being subject to libel or suit at all. Is that right?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; certain vessels, such as transports, occasionally carry passengers or carry freight, I am told, and they desire to have them excluded.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And they are not now subject to be libeled?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; that is not the intention. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 12046, the second deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12046) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a minute? I want to ask the gentleman if he would not, out of deference to Members on this side of the House, please let that go over until Monday the first thing? It will not lose any particular time.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, this bill is to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for support of the Government. It is only a partial report and it has to go back again into conference, I presume. The conferees feel that the report ought to be submitted to both Houses at the very earliest possible moment.

Mr. CALDWELL. But the gentleman knows that the Democratic Party in New York State is just having a convention at Albany, which is quite some distance from here, and there are certain Members on this side of the House prominently identified with Democratic matters——

Mr. GOOD. A few.

Mr. CALDWELL. And I think it is only a matter of courtesy to grant delay, and I ask it. Of course, if the Republicans have no courtesy at all to extend to Democrats, if they insist that while these men are away they will take advantage of them, there is not anything we can do; but I ask the gentleman in a spirit of fairness to do this. Never when the Democrats were in power in this House did we take advantage of any considerable number of Republicans being away at a State convention.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, there is no intention of taking advantage of anyone.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then, if there is no intention of taking advantage of Members who are away attending a State convention, let the matter go over until Monday, in order that they may be here.

Mr. GOOD. If we waited until every Member of the House could be here, we would not have action on a conference report at all. I can not agree. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to that; and in the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not do that. There are more Democrats on the floor now than Republicans.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to make such a statement.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And it is not true, anyhow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Apparently there is no quorum present.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the conference report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

JAMES W. GOOD,
J. G. CANNON,
JAMES F. BYRNES,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, there is one item in the conference report that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] desires to make some inquiry about and desires some time upon. It is in regard to a matter at Fort Leavenworth. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, there is an item in the conference report covering a provision inserted in the bill by the Senate to purchase a bridge across the Missouri River in order to connect two bodies of the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth. The purpose of it is to provide access to a thousand acres of land owned by the Government on the Missouri side, which land they desire for agricultural and military purposes, and which is absolutely useless to the Government unless they acquire possession of the old bridge. This bridge was taken charge of by the War Department under the war power, and this provision, inserted by the Senate, of $35,000 to complete the purchase of the bridge expedites the settlement of the claims the owners of the bridge have against the War Department, and for which they will ultimately be paid. But the conferees on the part of the House have inserted what I deem to be a very harmful proviso. They provide in case this certain bridge is thrown open for public use that one-half of the cost of the maintenance thereof shall be paid by local interests.

Mr. CALDWELL. What amendment is that?

Mr. ANTHONY. Senate amendment No. 30.

The situation is that there are a number of bridges either built or operated by the War Department across various streams over the country near military posts where the public has free use of the bridges, and if such a restrictive proviso is put upon this bridge at Fort Leavenworth it should apply equally to every bridge operated by the War Department where the public has the free use thereof, and not impose a burden upon that one community.

It is true that the proposition for the Government to operate this bridge is being fought by a railroad—the Chicago Great Western—which owns a bridge 3 miles to the south, and which thinks its wagon tolls may be impaired by the Government operation of this bridge 3 miles from it. Now, if the desire of the committee is to protect the railroad company, they have undoubtedly accomplished their purpose with this proviso. The president of that railroad company, Mr. Felton, was a member of the Council of National Defense here during the war, and through his influence the use of that 1,000 acres of land in Missouri, which was desired by the War Department, was handicapped all during the war through the selfish idea of protecting the railroad company. And therefore I believe the conferees should not accept the amendment of the Senate in that respect.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me some time? I want to talk about that subject and, incidentally, to pay my respect to the gentleman in charge of the bill. I do not want to camouflage the proposition at all.

Mr. GOOD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs visited Fort Leavenworth, Kans., a few weeks ago, and while there examined this bridge; and I heartily concur in everything that the gentleman from Kansas has said. This, in my opinion, is one of the outrageous things that sometimes happen in this House. The proposition as it appears now in this conference report was reported by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, that had charge of this bill, to this House; and it being in the shape that it was in, and being legislation upon an appropriation measure, I took occasion to make a point of order against it. The gentleman from Kansas, in whose district this bridge is located, agreed that that was the only fair and right thing to do from a legislative point of view, and the best thing for the Government; that it should be taken out of the bill rather than to have it put in in that way. The bill then went over to the Senate, and in the Senate they appropriated the money to pay for the bridge; and, as I understand it, the conferees have written this proviso in the bill that was knocked out here. The gentlemen now seek to force upon this House legislation that they do not know anything about and can not find out anything about. They try to tie up the Government and take away from the Committee on Military Affairs the power to legislate upon this subject that is inherently and necessarily a duty of that committee.

In a few days we will begin hearings upon the military appropriation bill, and it is there that this item ought to be considered. What does this Committee on Appropriations know about the reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.? What does it know about the school that is there, or the farm that is there, or anything else there? Have they visited it? Do they know anything about it except what somebody, with a purely personal interest in it, has to say to them? Have they made an inquiry about it? Is this House going to permit a subcommittee of two or three men to sit over there and listen to one side of that case—a Republican committee—and write into the bill a provision which a Republican Member from that district says is not fair to the Government or the people? Are you going to permit that to be done by the gentleman who shows such courtesy to the Democrats in this House in calling up this matter to-day, when the Democrats who are interested in this particular legislation are attending a Democratic convention and are unable to get here, and who wants to force a vote to-day in order that he can defeat a provision in this bill put in there by a Republican Senate? He does not agree it is the right thing to do. I want to say, gentlemen, that you can stand for that kind of legislation if you want to do so.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, Senate amendment No. 56, which is agreed to by the conference report, provides that "hereafter enrolled bills and resolutions of either House of Congress shall be printed on parchment or paper of suitable quality, as shall be determined by the Joint Committee on Printing." Does the gentleman from Iowa happen to know—probably it was not a very important matter in conference—why this change is proposed and what change is proposed?

Mr. GOOD. The reason given to the conferees that appealed to them was this, that at the present time parchment paper is very scarce and very, very expensive; that, through processes of manufacturing linen and bond paper, a paper almost if not equally good can be procured at less than one-half the cost of parchment paper; that the Joint Committee on Printing had thoroughly investigated the matter, and that they recommended this legislation; that the paper would be just as good for all practical purposes as parchment paper, and would result in the saving of about one-half of the cost of the parchment paper.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, that is a statement made to the House conferees. I do not wonder that they agreed to the proposition. But the statement is not true. To say that you can buy paper just as good for half price is all nonsense to begin with. The enrolled bills passed by Congress are laid away forever, or sooner, in the State Department. They ought to be preserved on the best quality of paper. That is parchment paper.

Now, the shortage in parchment paper is not like the shortage in print paper and newsprint paper and has nothing to do with it, and in the eagerness of a distinguished Member of another body, whom I have complimented often, to save a little money in printing, he proposes to cut out the use of parchment paper to keep documents which ought to last forever, and substitute some paper which will cost one-half as much and which will not last half as long. I think it is a great mistake.

Mr. GOOD. I assume that that will not be done unless a paper equally good at practically half the cost, as was represented to the conferees, would be the result of this legislation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have no doubt that some manufacturer who manufactures it will say that it is equally as good, but anybody who knows anything about parchment paper and other papers knows that you can not make any other paper equivalent to parchment paper. If you could make another paper for half the cost equally good there would be no parchment paper made.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. The statement was made to the Committee on Printing, I think by the Public Printer, that suitable paper could be purchased for this purpose at about half the price, and that the paper would be just as good. The statement was also made that when a bill was put on parchment it could be erased, but if a superior grade of paper were used as a substitute they could get paper that could not be erased. For that reason the Committee on Printing was in favor of allowing the bill to be amended, so that it would not be necessary to use parchment in printing the bills.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. I yield for a question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reference to amendment No. 9, regarding the appropriation for the Federal Board for Vocational Education, I notice the report shows that the House conferees agreed to a reduction of $1,000,000 in the amount originally carried in the House bill. I wanted to ask the gentleman this question: What facts were presented by the Senate conferees to induce the House conferees to reduce the appropriation $1,000,000 for that fund?

Mr. GOOD. They did not present very many facts. They simply made a reduction of $2,000,000, and the amendment was one that provoked considerable discussion before the conferees, the Senate holding that the amount carried in the House bill of $12,000,000 was too large and would not be necessary.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Did they give any reasons for that?

Mr. GOOD. No; they did not. They seemed to feel that the estimates made by the director and officers of the Vocational Board in regard to the increase in the number of men who would ask for training was overestimated and that they would not need the $12,000,000. The House conferees still feel that if this service grows, as there is every indication that it will grow, the amount carried by the House bill would not any more than take care of the service, and that in fact we would be likely to be compelled to make the item in the sundry civil bill for the next fiscal year immediately available in order to take care of some of the bills that might be contracted this year. The conferees of the House stood out for this full amount, and the Senate conferees were just as confident that they would not spend more than $10,000,000 as the House conferees were that they would require $12,000,000, and the best we could do was to split the difference with them, and we brought it back with $11,000,000 as the amount carried.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That, as the gentleman well knows, is very far below the amount as estimated by the board to be required.

Mr. GOOD. The estimate was $15,000,000. I agree with the gentleman that the full amount carried in the House bill should have been allowed, but we were compelled to come to an agreement, and we did the very best we could in the matter of this appropriation, and whatever is necessary will have to be appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In what bill?

Mr. GOOD. What is not carried in this bill will have to be taken care of in some other bill. That is evident, as the gentleman very well knows.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question in regard to the Vocational Board?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Amendment 10, stricken out by the Senate, has been restored, I find, by the conferees with an added proviso. I heartily approve of the restoration of that, but I would like to ask the chairman of the committee why it was not possible to reach an agreement looking to the adoption of the proposition submitted by the Vocational Rehabilitation Board so that the surplus machine tools hereafter declared as surplus could also be used by the Vocational Board?

Mr. GOOD. That matter was brought up. I remembered the gentleman's interest in the matter and suggested it to the conferees, but the position of the Senate conferees was that this item ought not to be carried at all, and that any enlargement of it would be subject to a point of order. The only thing to do in conference was either to agree or disagree to Senate amendment numbered 11. They were opposed to agreeing to this limited power, and expressed still greater opposition to an agreement whereby we would enlarge the power of the War Department to turn over machines and tools. It was our desire if possible to have shop machines and tools, in addition to those under the control of the Vocational Board, that belonged to the War Department turned over to the board when needed; but the Senate conferees would not agree to that.

Mr. TREADWAY. In other words, we have simply to abide by a wrong decision of the Senate. That appears to be the state of affairs.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman knows that when we go into conference we can not always have our own way.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman permit me to say in that connection that since this item has been before the House it has been necessary for the Vocational Board to go into the open market and endeavor to buy these very tools for the rehabilitation schools which might have been supplied by the War Department?

Mr. GOOD. If they are surplus tools and machines, the War Department has the power to sell all surplus machines and tools, and the board would be compelled to buy from the War Department and could not buy in the open market if the War Department had a surplus of these very tools and machines. That is the law.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am glad to know that is the law; but it is practically taking money out of one pocket in Uncle Sam's trousers and putting it into another pocket to make a better accounting and a better showing for the War Department.

Mr. GOOD. Yes. Still it keeps some account of what is being done with the vast amount of stores acquired by the War Department during the war.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is quite sure that is the law, is he?

Mr. GOOD. There is no question about that.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, may I have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for a moment?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. On page 7, at the bottom of the page, is what appears to be a Senate amendment granting an appropriation of $3,000 for a motor passenger vehicle for official use of the Secretary of the Senate. Then there is an additional $5,000 for motor vehicles for carrying the mails for official use.

Mr. Speaker, some time ago I tried to get a resolution passed permitting the soldiers when in search of work to travel on the railways of this country for 1 cent a mile. I have been unable to get that resolution out of the committee on the ground that we can not afford it. Now, if we can not afford to let the soldiers travel for 1 cent a mile, how can we afford to give a $3,000 passenger vehicle to the Secretary of the Senate and at the same time give him vehicles for the transportation of whatever rough work he may have to handle? Here are two passenger vehicles, one for the Secretary of the Senate and one for the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate. I do not think that the Clerk of the House has any passenger vehicle furnished him by the House to ride around in, and I do not see why the Secretary of the Senate should have one. If the chairman of the committee has any explanation of that, I should like to hear what it is.

Mr. GOOD. Answering the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL], I will say that these are Senate items. I do not believe that the Secretary of the Senate ought to have a passenger vehicle at Government expense at all. The Clerk of the House does not have one, and the Sergeant at Arms of the House does not have one supplied at Government expense. But an unwritten law has obtained for a century that when the House puts on an item for the benefit of the House the Senate conferees do not attempt seriously to strike out that item where there is a disagreement, and when the Senate puts on an item of this kind the House conferees have very little to say. The Senate conferees will not listen to any dispute or controversy about it. Senate amendment No. 54 carried an appropriation of $2,500 for the securing of plans and specifications for an addition to the Senate Office Building. The House conferees contended that that was altogether different than an appropriation for clerk hire or for automobiles or for contingent expenses; that it might involve the expenditure of millions of dollars in a building project not authorized by law. After a great deal of discussion we were able to have the Senate conferees agree that that item should go out, and the Senate receded. But this item is in a different class.

Mr. JUUL. I do not wish to embarrass the gentleman——

Mr. GOOD. It does not embarrass me at all.

Mr. JUUL. I am in earnest about this.

Mr. GOOD. So am I.

Mr. JUUL. Does it not seem to the gentleman that we should either give the gentleman who occupies the same official position in the House a motor vehicle to ride around in or else we should strike out the motor vehicle going to the Secretary of the Senate?

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is a valuable Member of the House——

Mr. JUUL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GOOD. There is going to be a vacancy in the Senate from the State of Illinois in the forthcoming election, and the only way I can suggest by which the gentleman can accomplish what he desires with regard to economy in the Senate is either to be a candidate for the Senate and be elected to that body and bring about these reforms or else elect somebody who will carry out his idea, because in conference we can not get the Senate conferees even to listen to a proposition to surrender on such items as this. The Senate is not a very economical body, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. JUUL. Then the gentleman means to tell me that we are compelled to vote for this item or vote against the entire report?

Mr. GOOD. We are practically compelled to do just as the Senate wishes about that item, in the same way that the Senate is compelled to agree to the House items of a similar character. The items are usually small.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. MILLER. I notice on Senate amendment 34 the conferees are unable to agree on the appropriation for $3,000,000 for the Bureau of Construction and Repair in the Navy.

Mr. GOOD. Yes. I imagine that whole matter will probably come up when we have disposed of the conference report under instructions. It is not in the conference report.

Mr. Speaker, in regard to the item referred to by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. This is really not a deficiency item at all. This was for the authority to buy a bridge where no authority exists under the law. The gentleman from Kansas should have brought in a bill through his committee authorizing the purchase of this bridge, and after that had become a law there would have been no question in regard to the appropriation.

Now, the facts are as stated practically by the gentleman from Kansas. I think there is a reason why we should acquire this bridge. The Secretary of War commandeered it during the war; spent $7,000 or $8,000 in repair. The whole question may go into the court, and it was the thought of the conferees that possibly the Government might be compelled to pay more than the amount agreed upon. That entered into the conclusion. But the House will recall that this same question came before us in a conference report last session, and the conferees disagreed to it. This time we put in this provision: That after the bridge has been purchased and put in repair and is thrown open to the public, if it is thrown open to the public, the local authority shall contribute one-half to the maintenance of the bridge. I think that is eminently fair.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. KEARNS. Is that same rule applicable to every other bridge in the United States?

Mr. GOOD. I understand it is not, but it should be.

Mr. KEARNS. Is it applicable to any other bridge?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know whether it is or not. So far as the bridge is concerned, I have no knowledge about the bridge referred to by the gentleman from Kansas. The bridge at Rock Island is a double-deck bridge, partly used by the railroad and a wagon road beneath.

The principal travel on the bridge, so I am advised, is travel to and from the arsenal by men having business at the arsenal. There is a little bridge at St. Paul which the gentleman refers to that I know nothing about. I know this is a matter that the Committee on Military Affairs should legislate on, and the Committee on Appropriations never desired to assume jurisdiction of the matter. The gentleman from Kansas casts aspersions on the conferees, insinuating that we are in collusion with the officers of the Great Western Railroad. As far as I am concerned, no person, except the gentleman from Kansas, outside of the conferees has spoken to me about the bridge. My whole information in regard to it, outside of the conferees, has come from the gentleman from Kansas, and if the president of the Great Western road is interested in this matter he has manifested his interest in some other way and not through the House conferees.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. ANTHONY. I informed the gentleman that this proposition had been tied up over a year in the War Department through the influence of the president of the railroad company, by reason of his position on the Council for National Defense. He has blocked every step toward the acquisition of this property.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-three Members present; not a quorum.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following-named Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and six Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has control of the time.

Mr. GOOD. For what purpose does the gentleman desire time?

Mr. JUUL. I want to have permission to speak for three minutes upon the subject of this bill and the fact that I do not think that I was treated very well——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I rose in my seat and requested the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to kindly grant me a few minutes time in which to discuss an item in this conference report. The item that I desire to discuss is an appropriation of $3,000 for the passenger motor vehicle for the official use of the Secretary of the Senate. I want to know if the Clerk of the House had a similar vehicle, and was informed that he had not. Under the item for $3,000 is another item for $5,000 for maintaining and equipping motor vehicles for carrying the mails and for the official use of the offices of the Secretary and Sergeant at Arms of the Senate. Vehicles evidently do the rough work over there. I thought that the $3,000 was out of order and unjust and should not have been appropriated out of the people's money.

In taking the matter up and standing in front of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman stated to me that I ought to go and have myself elected to the Senate, and then I could probably get an item like that stricken out. I think that was entirely uncalled for. If it was meant as sarcasm, it was in bad order; and if it was meant to wound me, it was uncalled for. I want to inform the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the gentlemen on this floor that I occupied for a number of years a similar position to the one that he occupies, in the senate of my State, and that I transacted business as the chairman of the committee on the judiciary for a State with over 6,000,000 people. I think a Member on this floor ought to be permitted to rise and discuss an item in this bill without being squelched and ridiculed by anybody. I resent it; I think it is unfair; I think it is uncalled for. If the gentleman thought when he said what he did say that it would embarrass me to sit in the Senate and that I would not be able to transact the business if I sat over there, he is entirely mistaken; and I want to add this, that there is not anybody back home in my State who thinks that I could not fill the position over there if elected to it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry if I said anything to hurt the feelings of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL]. Whatever I said was not so intended.

Now, with regard to this bridge at Leavenworth, Kans., we have on the Missouri side of the river 1,000 acres of land, and the penitentiary is on the Kansas side. The item is not properly a deficiency; it is not an appropriation that is authorized by law; and the only provision that we add is that if the bridge is thrown open for public use one-half the cost of the maintenance thereof shall be paid by local interests. There ought to have been legislation. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and there ought to have been legislation from that committee with regard to this matter. It is obvious to the committee that so far as the use of the bridge by the Government is concerned, it would be almost negligible as compared with the use the public would put the bridge to. It is also shown that if abutments were put to the bridge, made of concrete, it would cost almost $100,000. There is very little standing there now, except the braces and the girders. Some work, about $7,000 worth, has been put on the bridge, and the bridge has been condemned as an obstruction to navigation by the War Department. In view of all these facts, if this bridge is to be used by the public, as we are informed it will be, and as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] admits it will be used, then the public ought to contribute at least one-half of the expense. If the Government is to go out and build bridges here and there free of expense on the part of the local authorities, that is one proposition, but we place the provision in this amendment to protect the Treasury of the United States. If it does an injustice to that locality, the Committee on Military Affairs to-morrow can bring in a bill to repeal the provision.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. Was the statement made by my colleague that the Government has bridges of this character in other places and that no such provision has been placed upon them as in this bill?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; that statement was made.

Mr. TINCHER. And I suppose the only difference is that this is in Kansas and not in some other State.

Mr. GOOD. The use that will be made by the Government of this bridge is negligible.

Mr. CALDWELL. The bridge on the Kansas side is on Government property?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. The bridge on the Missouri side is on Government property?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. And there is no road running to it which the Government uses?

Mr. GOOD. I am advised by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] that it is intended to throw it open to the public.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman has not been there and seen this?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. CALDWELL. And the gentleman knows that a subcommittee of seven members of the Military Committee were there and did examine it?

Mr. GOOD. Then the Military Affairs Committee ought to bring in legislation. That is the point that I am trying to make, that it is a matter for legislation.

Mr. CALDWELL. By what rhyme or reason does the Committee on Appropriations undertake to legislate for the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If there is no road leading to this bridge on either side, what was the use of the bridge there?

Mr. CALDWELL. There are 1,000 acres of land on the Missouri side, and we have 1,000 men in prison on the Kansas side who need that kind of work, and if we could get that bridge, so that they could go back and forth, it would be very beneficial.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is for the future. What was the use of the bridge in the past?

Mr. CALDWELL. It was a railroad bridge, used exclusively by the railroad, and it burned.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, ordering the previous question on the conference report.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. VARE. For a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VARE. Does that prohibit debate on the other three sections?

Mr. GOOD. No; that will come after the conference report is disposed of.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 261, nays 31, answered "present" 5, not voting 131, as follows:

The name of Mr. TAGUE was again called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 17.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 17, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

CUSTOMS SERVICE.

For enforcing the laws governing the importation and exportation of intoxicating liquors by the Customs Service, $1,000,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take only a minute on this amendment unless somebody makes a preferential motion to bring the matter more clearly before the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for information?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this an addition to the million dollars that the House provided for some time ago for the enforcement of the prohibition law?

Mr. GOOD. No; this is for another object altogether.

Mr. BLANTON. This is for a different, distinct, and separate object?

Mr. GOOD. This, it seems to me, has for its object the attempt to make prohibition wholly ridiculous.

Mr. BLANTON. And comes from the enemies of the prohibition law?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know as to that.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman supposes that?

Mr. GOOD. It comes from the Treasury Department. I do not know who is responsible for it. I will say to the gentleman that, broadly speaking, it is for the purpose of hiring 1,000 men to guard 3,000 miles of territory along the Canadian border and about 1,800 miles of territory along the Mexican border, so as to prevent persons in automobiles, on horseback, in wagons, or on foot from coming across the line and bringing liquor into the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. There is not that much mescal in Mexico.

Mr. GOOD. I do not know anything about that. It did seem to the committee that with the $10,000,000 appropriated for collecting the customs, every dollar of the unexpended balance of which is available for this very purpose, to now appropriate $1,000,000 more and employ a thousand men would be a waste of money. In the first place, if we are going to patrol all along the border we must erect a wall along that border. We must protect it with aeroplanes; we must protect it in every possible way if you are going to try to keep out the importation of liquor in that manner. It is absolutely ridiculous, and would make any man who votes for it as a business proposition, it seems to me, look ridiculous. [Applause.]

We are considering the same matter before the sundry civil subcommittee. We have gone into the matter at considerable length, and it did not seem to the subcommittee that heard the testimony that this proposition could really be asked for in good faith. If we are to employ these men at every crossroad, we ought to have three men at every crossroad. We must have three shifts a day, and that will be 3,000 men instead of 1,000. But if they are only going to try to guard the crossroads, how about the spaces between the crossroads? What will prevent an automobile, in that vast space, going across the prairie and bringing in liquor? It is absolutely ridiculous to appropriate a million dollars for this purpose for the rest of this year. I believe in the enforcement of the prohibition law. It ought to be given a fair chance. A man who votes for this, it seems to me, throws upon the enforcement of that law an obligation by which no man or set of men can bring about any degree of enforcement.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Is there any money available for this particular purpose?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. There was $10,000,000 available for this year for all purposes of the Customs Service.

Mr. BOX. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization it has been complained that a large number of men are coming across the Canadian and Mexican borders in violation of immigration laws. We have been asked to present a bill authorizing an appropriation to better guard the Mexican and Canadian borders against the illegal entry of aliens. I am wondering whether, if this legislation is going through, this work can not be coordinated with the work of the immigration authorities, so as to avoid a duplication?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know whether the bill will pass the House or not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. As a matter of fact, there is to be a great expenditure to protect the borders of the United States with guards, and a great effort is to be made to enforce the policies in regard to immigration, liquor, and other things.

Mr. CALDWELL. To vote "yea" on the motion of the gentleman to insist on the House position in this matter would mean to strike out the $1,000,000?

Mr. GOOD. That is equivalent——

Mr. CALDWELL. A vote "yea," then, would on its face appear to be against the enforcement of prohibition also?

Mr. GOOD. Not at all. It would be in favor of a proposition to prevent the waste of $1,000,000 in a useless attempt to enforce this phase of the prohibition law.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will not the gentleman agree it is useless to attempt to enforce prohibition anyhow?

Mr. GOOD. I do not agree to that, but I agree that this appropriation is useless.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the House insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 17.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized.

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am in accord with the chairman of the Appropriation Committee in opposing the appropriation of $1,000,000 inserted in this bill by the Senate for the Customs Service. The Volstead Act appropriated $2,000,000 to the revenue department for the enforcement of the prohibition law for the balance of this fiscal year. It appropriated $100,000 to the Department of Justice for the same purpose for the balance of this fiscal year. This bill carries an additional sum of $1,000,000 for the revenue department for the purpose of guarding warehouses and thus aiding in the enforcement of the prohibition law from now until July 1.

The Coast Guard came before the Appropriations Committee recently, and in asking for a greatly increased appropriation urged that the increase was necessary in order that they might send aeroplanes out to sea in order to detect small craft coming into the Florida coast with liquor from ports to the south, and also to operate off the Florida coast hundreds of small vessels which they intended to take over from the Navy. There is not a department of the Government, it seems, that now does not want to put its hands into the Treasury in order to enforce the prohibition law. I voted for the resolution submitting the constitutional amendment. I voted for the Volstead Act, but I am not willing to make the enforcement of that law ridiculous in the eyes of the people of the Nation by granting every request that comes for millions of dollars for its enforcement by every department of this Government.

The only argument made in behalf of this appropriation is that while the revenue department is to spend its money in enforcing the prohibition law in the interior, there is no appropriation to enable the Customs Service to stop the smuggling in of whisky at the ports and across the Canadian border and the Mexican border.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I regret I can not yield. I have but a limited time. The representatives of the Customs Service have their agents at the ports now. They are supposed to inspect the property of the man who lands at those ports. If they inspect it for other reasons, they can determine whether or not he has a bottle of whisky in his grip; and as to the desirability of attempting to place an army along the Canadian border and the Mexican border, this sum of $1,000,000 would be merely that much money thrown away, because every man knows that it would take a man to a mile, and you would have to have three shifts a day, and it would take $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 for the Canadian border alone. And why this law alone should be singled out as an excuse for building a wall around the United States and employing an army I do not know nor does any man in this House know; and as a friend of the law, wanting to see it enforced and not wanting to make it ridiculous, I oppose this appropriation. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman says it would take "an army." Would it not be desirable, if this attempt is to be made in this way, to use the Army? Would not that be the only way it could ever be done?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; I agree that that is the only way it could be done.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the conference committee on this bill. I voted for the legislation that is upon the statute books. Let us look at it just a minute. One million dollars has been appropriated, as referred to, $200,000 of which is for the detection of frauds. This is also available to the Treasury Department, and practically to protect the revenue it is available for the purpose referred to.

I do not know what disposition may be made of the request of the Coast Guard, with airplanes to assist. From Maine across the continent on our northern border it is 3,500 miles, and on the southern border it is in the neighborhood of 2,500 miles, as I recollect. On the east the United States has the Atlantic Ocean, and on the south the Gulf, and on the west the Pacific Ocean. If I thought that this $1,000,000 was necessary for the enforcement of the law I would vote for it. [Applause.] I am in favor in good faith of enforcing the law, and it does not make any difference, it seems to me, what I thought about it heretofore. I voted for the legislation because the sentiment for a decade from the district which I have the honor to represent demanded the legislation, and I felt that the time had come when I should either resign or voice the sentiment of my constituency.

Now, I agree that nothing short of the Army and Navy, including the Coast Guard and including a thorough policing of six or seven thousand miles of land on the boundaries between us and the country upon the south and the country upon the north, would be efficient in guarding our borders. With the amount of money that is now available for the balance of the fiscal year, in my judgment—and I agree with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]—without regard to the $1,000,000 additional to what has been devoted to the enforcement of the laws along this line, without regard to the loss of the million dollars, it seems to me that the enemies of the prohibition law desire to make it ridiculous by reason of the extraordinary expenditure, and therefore, perhaps, favor this appropriation. I may be wrong about it. I do not think I am. But I agreed with the conference committee on the part of the House to bring it back to the House and let the House pass upon it, and, by a preferential motion, if anybody sees fit to make it, to agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 211, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, the next Senate amendment relates to the hospital at Chicago, numbered 22. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desires to make a preferential motion.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. I offer the following motion, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers a motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 22, and agree to the same with the following substitute:

"To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out at once the provisions of paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 7 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanitarium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines,' approved March 3, 1919, the limit of cost of the acquisition of the site and uncompleted building and completion and construction of the hospital buildings at Cook County, Ill., authorized by said act, is hereby increased from $3,000,000 to $3,400,000, and, for the purpose of carrying the foregoing authorization into effect, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $400,000, to remain available until expended: Provided, That no part of said sum so appropriated shall be used to pay any profit to either the owners of the land and present uncompleted buildings or to the contractor for the completion of the work."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I desire to offer a motion to concur with an amendment. I want to know if the gentleman from Iowa will allow me to offer that motion instead of moving the previous question?

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman desire to offer it now, so that it may be pending?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina offers a motion for the information of the House. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina moves to concur in Senate amendment No. 22 with an amendment striking out all of the paragraph after the word "of," on line 25, page 15, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Section 7 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanitarium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines,' approved March 3, 1919; so much of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes' (Public, No. 5, Sixty-sixth Congress); and so much of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the employees of the Compensation Commission and the Public Health Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920,' approved December 24, 1919, as directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire and complete the hospital at Broadview, Cook County, Ill., known as the Speedway Hospital, is hereby repealed, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to construct in Cook County, Ill., on land now owned by the Government or on a new site to be acquired by purchase or otherwise, a hospital plant, complete, at a cost not exceeding $3,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is read for information only. It has not yet been offered.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] that it has been suggested that it might be better if the gentleman would offer his amendment now as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, and I offer my amendment as a substitute, so that if the point of order is to be made it can be made at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. I reserve the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumes that the gentleman does not desire to have his amendment read again immediately, and the Chair will assume that he offers it as a substitute instead of for information.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. I reserve it.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. MADDEN. I will waive the point of order. I think we can determine the question on its merits. I am perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I assume that the gentleman wants to use some time in the discussion of this proposition, and inasmuch as the time is limited to one hour I will ask the gentleman if it will be satisfactory to him if I yield him one-half of that time?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Entirely satisfactory.

Mr. GOOD. I yield first 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, almost two years ago the Shank Co. began to construct a building proposed to be used for a hospital under the Public Health Service for the care of wounded soldiers who have been discharged from the service.

The work on this hospital was not done under a formal contract, but it was done under an informal contract and by authority of the public officials of the Government.

Later on, about the 16th of October last year, it was suggested by the contractor that if the Secretary of the Treasury would sign the contract authorizing the completion of the work he would complete the work for $3,000,000, and up to last December the contractor was ready to do that. The Secretary of the Treasury never was ready to sign a contract up to that time, although negotiations had been conducted from time to time looking to that end.

Later on the Secretary of the Treasury determined that he would sign a contract, and then it transpired that the cost of labor and material had risen so much higher than it was either in October or December, 1919, that it would be impossible for the contractor to proceed without great loss, and so the matter stands. When the question was up here a short time ago the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] wanted to know if anyone here could speak for those who were interested in the construction of this building and say for them that no additional appropriation would be requested or required. In response to that I said I was not authorized to speak, but that I was in favor of completing the work within the $3,000,000 that was then appropriated. But it seems that now that is not possible. Everything within the power of man that could be done by the contractor and his associates has been suggested to the Treasury Department with a view to closing a contract that would furnish the facilities needed to care for these wounded soldiers, but no agreement has yet been reached. Even the suggestion has been made by the contractor and his associates to the effect that they would take back 240 of the 320 acres of land at the price which they were to be paid for the entire 320 acres of land, thus proposing to give to the Government of the United States for this purpose 80 acres of land without cost upon which to construct these buildings.

It has been suggested by these contractors, and agreed to, I believe, by the Secretary of the Treasury, that various deductions can be made without in any way affecting the adequacy of the buildings, amounting to about $165,000, and proposals have been made to the effect that these men will now enter into a contract to construct the buildings called for by the plans and specifications of the Government at a cost not to exceed $3,400,000, and that all the excess labor cost and material cost shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that under no circumstances will these contractors require any profit on any contract which they may enter into; that they will do the work without profit and at cost. Could anything be fairer than that? I think not.

Now, the proposal under the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina prevents the possibility of furnishing facilities for the care of these wounded discharged soldiers, because if we were to enact that into law we would simply provide that the Secretary of the Treasury may build a hospital somewhere in Cook County to cost not to exceed $3,000,000. What is the first thing he would have to do under that? He would have to provide the land. How long would that take? It would take not less than two years to find and buy the land. How long would it take to put up the buildings? Not less than one year more, consuming three years of time before we would supply facilities to care for the men who have been wounded in defense of the flag.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understood the substitute proposal of the gentleman from South Carolina to say that the new hospital should be erected on land now owned by the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. "Or purchased."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Government does not now own any land suitable for this purpose in Cook County.

Mr. MADDEN. The Government owns a piece of land where the Marine Hospital stands, on Racine Avenue on the north side, and that land is 540 feet long. There is a hospital standing upon that land to-day. It has facilities for 120 men, 120 beds. There are now 140 patients in that building. That hospital has been there since I was a small boy and long before. It is utterly inadequate. It is antiquated; it is unfit for human use. It should be torn down and something else erected in its place.

The Illinois Tuberculosis Association has just reported that there are 1,200 tubercular patients in Illinois alone now awaiting hospital facilities. There are no hospital facilities in Chicago or around it except this Marine Hospital with facilities for 120 men, and the Cooper Hospital, now located in a private building, the owner of which refuses to extend the lease. There are facilities in the Cooper Hospital for 400 patients and the place is overcrowded. It is insanitary. What are you going to do? Are you going to say that because of a difference of the measly sum of three or four hundred thousand dollars you are not going to provide for the care of the men who gave themselves to the defense of the flag in the time of its direst need?

The time has come when we must stop this dillydallying, the time is here when we must act and act quickly, and if we expect to furnish facilities for the care of these men there is only one way to do it, and that is to appropriate this money, sign the contract on the terms which have been agreed upon, proceed to the completion of the building where the men can be taken care of within the next 90 days.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to have the gentleman state for the benefit of the Members how much sooner these buildings can be completed than new ones built.

Mr. MADDEN. I have said that these buildings could be completed in 90 days and that it would take 3 years to complete new buildings which you have not yet started. So that we would have 2 years and 9 months advantage over the proposal covered by the gentleman's amendment. Here we have 320 acres of land, fertile as no land anywhere in the United States is, 250 acres of which can be used for the purpose of raising food supplies for the men who are to be provided for in the hospital.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. GALLAGHER. To erect new buildings, would it not cost double what these buildings have cost?

Mr. MADDEN. You could not put up buildings that would be half the size of these for anything like the money that is proposed to be appropriated. The only reason why you can complete these buildings for the amount indicated is that we have already built the most of them under normal conditions, and conditions at present are abnormal. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. We will only have one speech on this side, and I presume the chairman wishes to close debate.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this is the same old hospital fight being gone over again. Instead of proceeding with the completion of the hospital, which is needed by the department, following out the precedents made by former Secretaries, the Secretary of the Treasury desires to go out and get more land and proceed to build another new hospital and delay the completion of necessary hospital facilities for the ex-service men of this country for two years. It is useless to talk about it. The Secretary of the Treasury and his entire force have for some unknown reason been opposed to the completion of this hospital. Whether it is because of personal feeling against some one connected with it I do not know, but I do know that unless we adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] we are not going to get the thing that is absolutely necessary for the wounded soldiers of this country for two years. This appropriation has been inserted by the unanimous vote of the Senate without regard to politics or personal feeling, and there is no reason why the House should not agree with the Senate and have the hospital in operation in three or four months. If the House does not do it the membership is at fault, and if they do not do it they will deserve the censure of all men.

The House on March 3 a year ago appropriated the money for the hospital, knowing that we needed it, and we can not get action. Always they came back with some new plan of delay. I hope every Member will join with us to secure the hospital facilities which we so much need. [Applause.] A vote for the Cannon amendment will get action.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would not speak at all were it not for the fact that I apprehend my beloved friend from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] might subsequently tell the House that I stated when this matter was up before that we would never ask for more than $3,000,000. I do not remember whether that was the exact statement I made, but it was substantially so. These were the circumstances: The Treasury Department, not feeling authorized and for other reasons not desiring to sign the contract under the original provision, had asked Congress to appropriate two and a half million dollars more for the construction of additional buildings. It is true that at the time I understood that if we passed the item authorizing a contract within the limit of $3,000,000 that would be sufficient to have these buildings completed. I stated then, and I state now, that as far as I am concerned I not only would not ask but I would be opposed to appropriating two and a half million dollars, or any part of it, toward the construction of this additional building which the Public Health Service was trying to get Congress to authorize. Of course, I do not know what may come in the far-distant future. I am not in favor of the plan proposed by the Public Health Service to provide not only a great hospital there, but buildings costing two and a half million dollars more for the use of nurses and physicians.

What is the proposition pending before us? Mr. Hines, through various circumstances, the main one of which was the loss of his son under very distressing conditions in France during the war, wanted to help the Government build a hospital for the use of the Government during the war. He proposed that he be allowed to do that to the extent that he would contribute a million or a millon and a half dollars and the Government should contribute the balance, and at the end of the war he would get the buildings back and then have the hospital, which he proposed to donate as a memorial to Chicago or to Illinois, whatever the local municipality might be. If his contract goes through and the hospital is built, he will then have given to the Government in the neighborhood of a million and a half dollars. He will be out a million and a half dollars. If the Government built a new hospital on ground already owned by the Government—although it does not own ground in Cook County, Ill., on which a hospital can be built—the Government would lose a million and a half dollars which Mr. Hines would otherwise contribute to the Government, and thereby reduce the size and the facilities of the hospital.

This matter has been before the House on a number of occasions. If we can now for $3,000,000 or $3,400,000 obtain a hospital which would cost five or five and a half million dollars to complete as a new proposition, are we not better off, will we not have better facilities than would be obtained by starting a new project and paying $3,000,000 for a half-size hospital which can not be obtained for several years? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] each have five minutes on this subject, not to be taken out of the hour.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. They are both in favor of this proposition, are they not?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; but my time has already been yielded. I have agreed to yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina, and I have not any time to grant to these gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. I will ask the Speaker now to recognize Mr. SABATH.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I think the Members of the House are familiar with the former legislation on this proposition, and I shall not take time to go into it now. I am satisfied that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] protects the interests of our Government. There is no one here who will deny that the hospital is badly needed. The hospital is needed, and we owe it to these boys to provide them a proper place in case of sickness. It has been stated that there are eleven hundred service boys in need of hospital or medical attention who can not be taken care of at this time. Our hospitals are filled now. We have no place anywhere within miles of Chicago where we can take care of these sick and suffering boys. The substitute offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] that the Government should build a hospital somewhere else is absolutely out of the question, and if the gentleman were acquainted with conditions in Chicago and in the vicinity of Chicago, from what I know of him I know that he would not have offered this substitute. The location that he referred to contains only a block and a half; it is in a crowded section, where thousands of automobiles pass every day. This great hospital, the Speedway, is 10 miles away from the courthouse. It is splendidly situated and will afford to these boys who need attention a splendid place to put in one, two, or three weeks when in need of medical treatment.

I do not know how much money Mr. Hines is donating to the Government. I do not know whether it is a million or a cent; but even if he is not donating a penny, our Government is rich enough and is in duty bound to provide for these boys. It will be a shame and a disgrace if we should delay another three or six months or another year, as we have already done. I do not know the reason behind this effort to prevent the erection and completion of this hospital. No one has charged that it is too expensive. It is fireproof; it can not be duplicated for the same price now, nor can the ground be obtained for the same price. As I understand the motion, it is to provide $400,000 in addition to the $3,000,000, although it may not require more than $150,000 or $200,000. If it is not used, it will go back into the Treasury. I think the motion of the gentleman from Illinois ought to prevail.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from South Carolina give him a minute in which to answer a question?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes, if the gentleman asks me to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAZARO. Gentlemen on both sides of the aisle speak of the cost, speak of dollars. What I am interested in is the element of time. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that this hospital which has been started will be completed within three months and the other one in about three years?

Mr. SABATH. This hospital is under roof now. It is a building over 2,000 feet long, it is fireproof, and I believe it can be completed within 90 days. It would have been completed a year ago had it not been for a lot of technical questions that came up from time to time.

Mr. LAZARO. Another question: Have gentlemen on both sides of the aisle taken into consideration the fact that in order to cure tubercular patients you have got to start now, and if you wait a year or nine months it will be too late?

Mr. SABATH. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. If they had purchased this hospital when it was offered first, they would have saved $400,000.

Mr. SABATH. Why, we would have saved $900,000. It is the same as with the Chicago post office. If we had acted when we should, we would have saved to the Government $4,000,000; and if we do not act now, the chances are that we will be obliged and the public will demand that we appropriate instead of $400,000 perhaps $4,000,000 more. I do not agree with my colleague [Mr. MANN], and I would not refuse to appropriate in the future any additional sum of money recommended by the department. On the contrary, I am ready and willing to appropriate any amount of money which is necessary to properly take care of the boys who have served our Nation. We can not do too much for them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I feel that the House and the country should know the situation with reference to the hospital facilities for the sick and disabled soldiers who have come out of the recent war. On December 5 last the Secretary of the Treasury sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives a communication, which, on December 8, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. This Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has held hearings for six or seven days upon a bill suggested by the ex-Secretary of the Treasury, now a Member of the Senate [Mr. GLASS]. Those hearings have brought out the great need for hospital facilities for the care of the soldiers, sailors, and marines who have returned from the war sick or disabled. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. GLASS, in the communication of December 5, 1919, stated to the Speaker of the House that there would be required during the next two years 30,600 beds for the care of these ex-service men, and that the total number of hospitals now operated by the Public Health Service provide 7,200 beds, leaving a balance of 23,400 beds to be provided within the next two years.

Representatives of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the Public Health Service have appeared before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and asked for $85,445,000, to be expended as follows: Fifteen million dollars for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920; $25,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921; $20,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922; $18,425,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, for construction purposes, and, in addition, $1,400,000 for 1920, $2,200,000 for 1921, $2,000,000 for 1922, and $1,400,000 for 1923, for furniture and equipment, all for the purpose of providing accommodations for the care of discharged sick and disabled ex-service men from the late war.

Hearings before the committee show that none of the projects included in the act of March 3, 1919, have been advanced sufficiently to justify an expectation that they will be ready for use within the present year, with the single exception of the Broadview Hospital, at Chicago, which could have been completed within not to exceed four months at any time since March 3, 1919.

The owners and contractors for the Broadview Hospital would have completed the building within the limit of cost of $3,000,000 if they had been permitted to begin work at any time prior to October 16, 1919. The Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to take over the Broadview or Speedway Hospital by the act of March 3, 1919; thereafter he was directed to acquire the property on July 11, 1919, and again directed by Congress to close the matter on December 24, 1919. During all this time the cost of material and the scale of wages have constantly increased, and with the opening of the spring season at this time further large advances in both material and labor are inevitable. In fact, the labor unions belonging to the Building Trades Council in Chicago have already served notice of a demand for increased wages to take effect both on April 1 and May 1. The situation resulted in action being taken by the Associated Building Contractors of the State of Illinois at their third annual convention at Chicago on January 7 and 8 advising their members to protect themselves by inserting in every contract a provision that the proposition therein made is based upon the cost of material as of the date of the contract, and that the owners will be charged or credited with the increase or decrease in the cost of material and labor over or under the prices which existed upon the date of the contract. Similar action has been taken by the building interests throughout the United States.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is now confronted with the necessity of acting upon the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, asking further authorization to procure hospital facilities. The situation is appalling. Everywhere throughout the country there are hundreds and thousands of men who are waiting for hospital care and treatment, who are suffering disabilities and ailments and diseases contracted in the recent war. I do not apprehend that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is going to stand upon the queries which he propounded to some of us in a recent discussion of this matter, but if he does, I want to call attention to the question which was asked of me. It was then proposed by the Bureau of the Public Health Service and by the Secretary of the Treasury, not by Members of the House who advocated this proposition, that an additional appropriation of $2,500,000 should be made for the purpose of enlarging not only the capacity but the scope and purpose of the Broadview Hospital. The gentleman from South Carolina, interrupting me at that time, said:

> I want the gentleman to tell me in that one one word—
> Which I was about to utter—
> whether he is going to come back here and ask for the two and a half million dollars.

And, as the record shows, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] answered, "I am not." We are not here now asking for the two and a half million dollars; but, Mr. Speaker, let me say this: It is almost a year since the Secretary of the Treasury was first authorized to acquire this property or some other suitable property for the care of the sick and disabled ex-service men in the Middle West. He has done nothing yet. The buildings at Broadview could have been completed within four months at any time since the 3d of March, 1919. If there be any increased cost now, it has been caused by these repeated delays of the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. May I have one minute more?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, we did have an agreement in which the time was fixed——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I understood the request was that the time be extended outside of the time fixed.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend and revise my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER. Forty-three minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, is not that incorrect, because I understand we on this side are to have 30 minutes?

The SPEAKER. The Chair included the 30 minutes which the gentleman from Iowa is going to yield to the gentleman from South Carolina, and he has 13 minutes besides,

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina. There will be but a combination speech on this side between the gentleman from Illinois and myself.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I understood the gentleman to have but one speech, but I have no objection to his having two.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I dislike very much again to discuss this question of the Speedway Hospital. I hoped that we had finished with it; but, like Banquo's ghost, it will not down. The Speedway Hospital has been before Congress for many months. The fact is that it originated as the result of the abandonment of what was known as the Speedway race track. Mr. Edward Hines, having started the construction of that enterprise, had upon his hands during the year 1918 an immense lot of steel girders and other material that had been purchased for the grandstand. It is difficult to know for what purpose they could be used other than in the construction of such a building as has been erected. I can only speculate as to what motive actuated him in commencing the construction of this building and in endeavoring to sell it to the War Department in the summer of 1918. The officers of the War Department at that time were exceedingly anxious to take over anything and everything that they could find that would serve the purpose of a hospital building, anticipating as they did that the war would continue for many months, if not years, to come. A subordinate officer approved the plans by putting his initials upon the plan of the hospital submitted to him by Mr. Hines and his representatives. Before it reached the Secretary of War or the Assistant Secretary of War for his approval, Mr. Hines proceeded with the construction of that building, and finally telegraphed asking that the War Department secure priorities for the shipment of certain material necessary for the building of this hospital under contract with the War Department. The Secretary of War immediately telegraphed him that if he was under the impression that he had a contract with the War Department for the construction of the hospital that he was mistaken, and he was proceeding at his own risk. No contract was ever signed with Mr. Hines; and, notwithstanding the repeated statements upon this floor with reference to a contract had with the War Department, there never was a contract and there is no contract to-day.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; I can not yield. I am going to state the history of this thing. Upon the cessation of hostilities November 11 it became apparent that the War Department had no use whatever for this immense hospital building. These gentlemen then went to the Public Health Service, and they were wise in doing it, because, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has so often stated on the floor, there is no department of the Government more anxious to branch out and extend its activities than the Public Health Service, and they were willing to take over the building, provided it could be adapted to the needs of the Public Health Service. Negotiations followed. Finally, on March 3, 1919, this Congress passed an act—I have it here—and I wish to read it to the House, because I want the House once and for all to understand this Speedway Hospital matter.

Gentlemen to-day tell you that on March 3 the Congress directed the Secretary of the Treasury to take over this hospital immediately and complete it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can not yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Has anybody said he was directed?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I have refused to yield.

In March, 1919, Congress passed an act providing that the hospital in Cook County, Ill., should be taken over, but the act contained this provision:

Provided, That if the Secretary of the Treasury shall make a finding that any hospital project hereinafter specifically authorized is not to the best interest of the Government from the standpoint of cost, location, and of the emergency needs of the Public Health Service he is hereby authorized to reject such project or projects and to locate, construct, or acquire hospitals at such other locations as would best subserve the interest of the Government and the emergency needs of the Public Health Service within the limits of cost of such authorization.

This act limited the expenditure to $3,000,000. It was a discretionary act of Congress. It placed in the Secretary of the Treasury the discretionary authority to complete the Speedway Hospital, or, if he did not think it best served the interest of the Government, then to go elsewhere and construct a building. The Secretary of the Treasury, following out the mandate of the act of Congress that said he must investigate as to whether it would best serve the interests of the Government, caused the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service and the Supervising Architect to come before him. The Supervising Architect submitted to him a memorandum telling him if he signed the contract which was referred to in this act that the Government would buy an extraordinary amount of trouble. Upon that recommendation of the Supervising Architect the Secretary of the Treasury proceeded to investigate. He submitted it to the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, asking him to determine what the needs of the Public Health Service were, and when those needs were determined he submitted the matter to the Supervising Architect in order to ascertain whether it could be completed within the limit of cost. He had to do it to comply with the act of Congress that said this building must be suited to the needs of the Public Health Service and limited the cost to $3,000,000. The Supervising Architect reported to him that in order to adapt that building to the needs of the Public Health Service it would cost $2,500,000 in addition to the $3,000,000 appropriated by Congress. The law officer of the Treasury Department advised the Secretary of the Treasury that he could not sign a contract exceeding $3,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury then proceeded to exercise the discretion placed in him by this act, and investigated what is known as the marine hospital site. Plans were drawn—tentative plans are to-day in the Supervising Architect's office—for the construction of a hospital building on land owned by the Government, known as the marine hospital site.

At that time the gentlemen interested in the Speedway proposition heard what was in the mind of the Secretary of the Treasury. They knew he was considering the erection of a hospital on the marine hospital site instead of completing the Speedway Hospital. And then what happened? A deficiency bill went to the Senate. And here on the last night of that session of Congress, prior to the next fiscal year, when the deficiency bill came back to the House it had on it a provision making it mandatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury to take over the Speedway Hospital and taking away from him the discretion he was about to exercise in favor of constructing a new building in Cook County, Ill. But the gentlemen who framed that amendment and put it on the deficiency bill in the Senate framed it so that it provided again that it was discretionary to the extent that the Secretary had to adapt it to the needs and purposes of the Public Health Service. The Public Health Service immediately proceeded to frame its plans, and when the plans were submitted to the Supervising Architect he advised the Secretary that to complete the buildings in accordance with what the Public Health Service said was necessary to make it suit their needs would make it cost $5,500,000. I was opposed to the Congress appropriating $5,500,000 for this hospital. In December we sent to the Senate a bill providing an urgent deficiency appropriation for the Employees' Compensation Commission and the Public Health Service, and in accordance with its custom the Senate again legislated on the subject of the Speedway Hospital, directing that the Secretary of the Treasury proceed without regard to the needs of the Public Health Service to complete this Speedway Hospital at a sum not exceeding $3,000,000.

Now, what happened? The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] presented that bill the afternoon the House adjourned for the holidays. There was not a quorum in the House, and I first made the point of no quorum. I then withdrew it until I could ascertain what was included in the Senate amendment. Then my good friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who, knowing what he said at that time, had to make a speech to-day, told us this would settle the question. I told him I was opposed to spending one dollar over the $3,000,000, but because I had been told by gentlemen that this would settle the Speedway matter I would not insist upon a quorum and would vote for the bill, but that I feared they would come and ask for more than $3,000,000. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] knows that he told us $3,000,000 would build this hospital. If he is in doubt about it, I will read it to him. Mr. MADDEN said:

As far as I understand the situation, it is that the Secretary of the Treasury prepare plans for such buildings as he had suggested to him by the Public Health Service; that the people who are interested in this matter have agreed to complete the contract for the buildings on such a plan as he submits within the $3,000,000.

And then in another place he says:

I think that within the $3,000,000 proposed they can put up all the buildings they need.

And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said practically the same thing, and I have great confidence in his judgment. I had such confidence in his judgment and the statements of these other gentlemen that I did not insist upon a quorum, did not oppose the conference report, and it went through.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] also had to make a speech to-day, because he went on record as agreeing to the $3,000,000.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I read the language of the report.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not know what you read, I do not recall your language, but in substance you did so agree. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] went further and said:

And the Public Health Service and the Secretary of the Treasury ought to understand that by taking this action it is the intention of Congress that this building and the 320 acres of land and the five auxiliary buildings shall be acquired within the present limit of cost.

And again he said:

It will be useless, so far as I am concerned, for the Secretary or the Public Health Service to come before the Committee on Appropriations or any other committee of this House asking for anything in addition to the $3,000,000 already appropriated for the purpose of acquiring this hospital.

And I say in justice to the gentleman from Iowa that he took the same position in conference, refusing to agree to the Senate amendment because of his promise to the House. Two or three weeks ago, when this subject was discussed, gentlemen charged the Secretary of the Treasury with refusing to sign this contract, when he had time and again offered to sign it for $3,000,000. In the presence of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] Mr. GLASS offered to Mr. Hines the contract and said, "If you sign that with Mr. FORDNEY as a witness for $3,000,000 I will agree to the changes you say you can make, which will save $165,000, and will let you keep that $165,000." And Mr. Hines refused to sign unless the contract included a provision giving him in addition to the $3,000,000 a sum equaling the increase in labor and material since last October.

Mr. FORDNEY has told me that this offer was made in his presence. Time and again Mr. GLASS offered to sign it. Yet gentlemen sought to create the impression that the Secretary of the Treasury was refusing to sign the contract as authorized by law. The gentlemen who are interested in this proposition submitted a contract which provided for $3,000,000 plus an amount that would equal whatever increase in cost of material was incurred from October 16, 1919, by them. They not only did that, but I will call your attention to another thing right now. During the consideration of this matter, since Secretary Houston has become the Secretary of the Treasury, about February 8, they offered the Supervising Architect a contract which had a stipulation to provide that out of this $3,500,000 that the Government shall pay $28,856.96 to cover the increase in cost of labor from August 26, 1918, until March 15, 1919, before Congress ever legislated on the subject at all.

The stipulation reads:

It is also understood and agreed that the party of the second part has a claim for extra compensation already earned on account of the increase in the scales of labor wages between August 26, 1918, and March 15, 1919, and that the amount of said claim does not exceed $28,856.96. The amount of this claim is subject to verification by the Supervising Architect and in the amount found by him to be due is payable out of the sum of $3,500,000 authorized and appropriated for this project.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I regret I can not yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. You are not quoting the record, and I have the stipulation here in the papers, and I will be glad to show it to the gentleman—the language of it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman is referring to the stipulation in the final contract presented to the Secretary. What I have read is the stipulation first offered to the architect. I have read the original and copied it myself. They handed it to the Supervising Architect, and he stated that he could not even consider it, and it was not presented to Secretary Houston by the architect, and the contract that is now offered by Mr. Hines does not contain it. But it is not because they did not try to put it over.

Now, what are you going to do about it? Why, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] says the reason for this action is that the cost of labor has gone up in two months. Before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the gentleman who represents Mr. Hines, Mr. Bennet, says first that in a letter, dated October 16, 1919, he had agreed to build this hospital for $3,000,000; then he stated, on page 48, "What you have just read shows that we said then that we could not complete it for $3,000,000, and we never would have been able to do it." This shows they never have had any idea of signing a contract for $3,000,000. Then, on the same page, he says the reason he is not now willing to build for $3,000,000 is the fact that labor has gone up in the last two months, just as Mr. MADDEN states. What has that got to do with it, when away back in January the Secretary of the Treasury offered to sign this contract for $3,000,000? And when Mr. Bennet came before the conference committee he gave an entirely different excuse. He told us, "The increase in the cost of labor and material during the last 60 days is not great, but I am now asking for $500,000 more because of the fact that the builders in Chicago have adopted a resolution to the effect that every contractor should insist upon this cost-plus provision, inasmuch as the union labor in Chicago is asking for an increase of wages, to take effect in April."

Gentlemen of the House, when I asked him to hand me the paper, the bulletin was marked "February," so that he never had seen it at the time he refused to sign that contract in January in the presence of Mr. FORDNEY, when Mr. GLASS offered it to him.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I regret I can not yield.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I have no interest in this matter one way or the other, but I want to be able to vote intelligently.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Very well; go ahead and ask the question.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Why did he refuse to sign the contract?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The last reason he gave was that in a bulletin that he has from the Builders' Exchange of Chicago it is stated that the union labor of Chicago asks for an increase of wages of 60 or 75 or some other large per cent, to take effect in April, and therefore it would not be safe for them, he says, to sign this contract without having in it this provision, paying for any increased cost of labor and material back to October. They want you in advance to appropriate $500,000 so that labor will know they have the money to meet their increased demands and there is no incentive to him to keep down the cost of labor or material. And now for the first time, after they have denied time and time again that that provision in their contract would cost a single dollar over the $3,000,000, they come in and say they want $500,000 and admit that when they asked the Secretary to sign that contract under the law limiting the cost to $3,000,000 that they knew it would cost $3,500,000. The Secretary of the Treasury agreed that they could make certain changes, provided these changes were approved by him. Mr. Houston stated in the presence of Mr. Bennet the other day "I will approve of the changes that will enable them to save about $100,000." I said, "Mr. Secretary, if you can get them to sign that contract for $3,000,000, will you agree to allow these changes and thus give them this $100,000 extra?" He said, "Yes, but they will not agree." And Mr. Bennet stated then that they would not agree, even though they got this $100,000. Then Mr. GOOD said to Mr. Bennet: "You told me you could get out if you had those changes."

Now, I ask you to turn to the hearings here of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in December—not last March, but December 17 and 18, 1919—and here is what Mr. Bennet said:

I want to make it plain that the present contractors believe—and the Chicago people believe—that $3,000,000 will erect a sufficient hospital for the needs of the Public Health Service.

Then gentlemen on that committee asked him whether, if they granted the legislation he wanted making it mandatory to accept this building, it would increase the appropriation, and he said, "Not a penny; not one cent."

Now, I will tell you why he took that position. The Secretary of the Treasury had discretion in the matter. They had to get that discretion out of the hands of the Secretary. If they had come in and asked Congress to take that discretion away and force him to sign the Speedway contract without regard to the needs of the Public Health Service and at the same time had asked for $500,000 additional, Congress might not have done it, so that they take one bite at a time, and they make this provision mandatory in the first deficiency bill, and then in this deficiency bill they come in for $500,000 additional. The Lord only knows what they will ask in the next bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can not yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to clear up one point on the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I regret I have not the time. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in whom I have great confidence, has been misled. They have all been misled. A deficiency bill came in here in July. It had legislation for the Speedway Hospital on it. The House gave what they asked. A deficiency bill came in here again in December. It had legislation for the Speedway Hospital on it. They all swore it would not cost a dollar more than $3,000,000. The House gave what they asked. Now, this bill has legislation for the Speedway on it, and it will cost the people $500,000. Later we will have another deficiency bill, and I am wondering how much more will be demanded.

You are in here within two months asking for $500,000 more, one-sixth of the cost, and you are going to find these people asking for something on the next deficiency bill and on every deficiency bill that comes through the Senate. The Supervising Architect was right. The Government is buying an extraordinary amount of trouble. The only thing to do is to vote for my amendment and take $3,000,000 and construct a hospital in Cook County, either on the marine hospital site or on land to be purchased, and in either event you will get it cheaper; for just as sure as I am standing here you are not now appropriating the last dollar for this building when you appropriate $3,500,000. You can not tie them up in a contract. I have seen Houdini down here at Keith's Theater, and I would rather undertake to tie up Houdini than to tie up these people in a contract and hope to hold them to it. You can not do it. Every time a deficiency bill comes in here pressure is brought to bear to secure some legislation they desire. The present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Houston, is a very good man, but he does not know what he has gotten into. He said the other day that he was not able to attend to any business of the office of the Secretary of the Treasury except the Speedway business, and I fear he will have time for little else if you do not adopt my amendment and abandon this Speedway building. Gentlemen, the Court of Claims in the final analysis will wind up the affairs of the Speedway Hospital, because you can not bind them.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. Can the gentleman tell us what was the original character of the construction of this building?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Constructed out of the girders of the grand stand of the speedway and the other material purchased for stands. Of course, additional material had to be purchased.

Mr. GARD. Was that a race track?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. A race track.

Mr. SABATH. It was an entirely new building.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said that Mr. Hines lost a million dollars in this thing. I know he was so informed; but what are the facts? The Supervising Architect sent his experts to look at the building which is now standing in Chicago. Mr. Hines says it is worth $1,600,000—$300,000 for the land and $1,300,000 for the building. The Government experts went over the building and their estimate is that the building is worth only $1,000,000 instead of $1,300,000. So when you take over this building you give him $1,600,000 for land and building when the Supervising Architect's experts say it is worth $1,300,000, and you give him $1,900,000 to complete it. You not only give him $500,000 velvet, but you give him the $300,000 over and above what the officials of the Government say his building is worth. Then, in addition to that, he is going to get the changes in the interest of economy which amount to $165,000 according to Mr. Hines, but only $100,000 according to Mr. Houston. Now, that is what you are going to do. My friend from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] said to his colleague [Mr. MANN] that he would vote for any appropriation for that. Of course he would.

Mr. SABATH. Not for that. I said for this purpose.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; for that purpose. You could offer an amendment for $5,000,000 and he would vote for it, and we all know it, and there are other good-hearted gentlemen here who will vote for it at any time; but, my friends, we have a duty to perform. It may be an unpleasant duty, but you have got to protect the Treasury sometimes, and when you quarrel here day after day to save a dollar here and a dollar there by cutting somebody's salary and then come in here and throw away $500,000 at one time when it is unnecessary you are not making any saving.

Adopt my amendment, and before Monday morning, before the Senate can act on this matter, Mr. Hines will sign that contract for $3,000,000. He would not let it get away from him. The Secretary of the Treasury could not take an aeroplane and get away from him. There is no chance for it. Talk to me about sentiment! I hate to say a word about it, because I have no doubt that Mr. Hines's son was a splendid young man. He was a lieutenant who died in France, not in battle but in sickness, just as much a hero as if he had died in battle; but I do not believe in coming in here and under the cloak of a soldier who died in France trying to appropriate money from the Treasury in this manner. If Mr. Hines, who is a millionaire, was commemorating the death of his son, would he come here to-day and refuse to sign this contract for $3,000,000 when it is the amount he asked for in December, and his representative, Mr. Bennet, promised time and again they would complete it for $3,000,000? Would he come in here and try to get $28,000 to cover the increase in the cost of labor and material between August, 1918, and March, 1919, before the Government ever touched it? That does not look like sentiment. The gentleman from Illinois says Mr. Hines is giving the Government a million dollars. Great God, I never knew a man in my life who needed to employ a lawyer to spend six months here trying to force the Government to take a million dollars away from him. Looking a gift horse in the mouth! Yes; sometimes you had better do it when they come and tell you they are giving a million dollars away. One day in the discussion on the floor here I heard the gentleman from Dakota say that Mr. Hines would not sign the contract drawn up by Mr. GLASS, because it would cost the Government more than $3,000,000. And now they are asking for $500,000 more than the $3,000,000. Did you ever hear of such a thing? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. GOOD and Mr. GARRETT moved a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. On this call 313 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to modify the amendment which I have offered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with the following substitute:

"To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out at once the provisions of paragraphs A and B of section 7 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanitarium facilities for the discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines,' approved March 3, 1919, the limit of cost of the acquisition of the site and uncompleted buildings and the completion of the construction of the hospital building in Cook County, Ill., authorized by said act, is hereby increased from $3,000,000 to $3,400,000: Provided, That no part of said sum so appropriated shall be used to pay any profit to either the owners of the land and present uncompleted buildings or to the contractor for the completion of the work."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, is my modification agreed to?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, let us understand the parliamentary situation. My colleague offered the original proposition, and to that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] offered an amendment by way of substitute. Now, if my colleague has withdrawn his motion and offered a new one instead of asking for a modification of his original motion, on which will the vote first come? Does he offer it as an original proposition?

Mr. CANNON. No; I modify my amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I live in Illinois. [Applause.] Iowa, Mchigan, Indiana, and various other States, with a great population, center about the great city of Chicago. I saw a newspaper statement the other day that Chicago, as will be shown by the census, is the most populous city in the world. If it is not, it soon will be. There is a great population to be served, and a large part of that population was in this contest to win the war. [Applause.] This is a proposition to care for the disabled, the people that were wounded, the people that are sick. It is needed, and needed as speedily as possible.

Now, this is a proposition to increase the limit of cost not $500,000 but $400,000. Oh, a gift, says my friend, to this speculator for his half section of land and unfinished hospital. Nay, nay; not a gift, but a proposition that there shall be no profit to him nor to the contractor.

Now, the present Secretary of the Treasury we had before us for an hour going over this matter while we were in conference. He is desirous—and I measure my words—that this site shall be acquired and the hospital be completed. What does the gentleman from South Carolina propose in lieu of this?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Briefly.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The Secretary of the Treasury said he wished it understood that he was making no recommendation about this at all.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman understands that he is favorable to it, that he desires to acquire it, and the whole conversation showed that he is friendly to the proposition, as he ought to be.

Now, what is the alternative offered by the gentleman from South Carolina? It is to construct a hospital from the foundation, including the site, for $3,000,000. The Government has no site except where the Marine Hospital is situated, about 15 acres. There is a hospital on that as against 320 acres well drained which is 6 miles from State Street with a hard road, with an elevated road within a mile of it. Why, you could not do the drainage that they have got there into the Des Planes River for many hundred thousands of dollars.

Oh, but there is something wrong about this, says my friend. Great heavens, it was a speedway, and they used the steel girders to construct this hospital in this arrangement. Good Lord, is the steel spoiled? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. No; I have only 6 minutes. Now, is this hospital needed? Yes. Ought the limit of cost to be increased $400,000? Yes. Why? Because you can not buy, as I am credibly informed, materials to complete this building except by agreeing to pay the price when delivered, which is constantly advancing. Everybody knows that prices are constantly advancing as the country is trying to get back to the normal rate of erecting buildings. Insurance? A prudent man insures. Notice has been given by the union working people that on the 1st day of April the wages will be increased 50 per cent in that great city, and have notified contractors that they have got to be careful to include that increase in their contracts.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for two minutes more not to be taken out of the time allotted.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that if the Byrnes substitute is adopted this contract will be signed within a few hours afterwards and we will save $400,000?

Mr. CANNON. No. I deny the truth of that, because these 320 acres are worth far more if you tear down the hospital than they were worth with the advancing prices of real estate and the depreciated currency that we have. What is the sensible thing to do? Not to exhibit a lot of temper, but to determine what, in that center of population, will provide a great hospital to care for the soldiers who are sick and wounded, and what will provide it most speedily, without profit, without one cent of profit, under the direct supervision of the present Secretary of the Treasury, with all of his officials, under a contract that enables him to comply with these provisions. I hope to God it may be completed for less than $3,400,000, and it will be, provided it can be under that contract and under that superintendence. There is nothing for insurance, nothing for the advance of wages, nothing for the advance of material. I would not take this contract if you would make it $1,000,000 instead of $400,000—not $500,000. We strike out the appropriation and we authorized the expenditure of $400,000, and I believe it will be completed for less than that. My God, what kind of word are you going to send to this great soldier population in this great center of the great Northwest? Are you going to tell them that there was a little disagreement with the former Secretary of the Treasury, or a little disagreement about this or that or the other, and that the contract was not made? A plague on the contractor, a plague on everybody concerned! I want to be practical. There is no place for you to spend your $3,000,000. God knows what 320 acres or half that amount would cost, if you chose to condemn or to purchase. You know the people who are lame and halt and blind do not understand about the fuss between the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and the Chicago contractor. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to assure the House that I think no Member of the House is more embarrassed over the hospital situation than I am. I have tried as best I could to have this hospital building completed within the limit of cost. I am sorry that the contract was not signed six months ago, when it might have been possible to complete the contract within the limit of cost. I hope it can still be completed within that limit. All depends upon the labor and material market. The question that I have been called upon to decide is, Shall I adhere to my former position and avoid personal embarrassments and prevent the building of a much-needed hospital for our sick and wounded discharged soldiers or face the embarrassment and help secure the hospital facilities asked for by the present Secretary of the Treasury? I wish from the bottom of my heart that the Treasury Department had one program with regard to the building of all of these hospitals. At Chicago the Secretary of the Treasury will not sign this contract because there is a provision in it which might require the expenditure of more than the limit of cost, and in that I commend his action; but at Dawsonsprings, Ky., where he is authorized to build a hospital for 500 beds at a limit of cost of $1,500,000, he does not adopt the same program. Here he has a plan for 23 hospital buildings and a limit of cost of $1,500,000, and has let a contract for one building for $500,000, and proposed to build the 22 hospital buildings at day labor, and how much they will cost nobody knows, and the Treasury does not and can not know and seemingly does not care!

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I can not yield.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman ought not to state what is not true.

Mr. GOOD. He is proceeding to build one building for $500,000, leaving $1,000,000 for 22 buildings, but for the hospital at Chicago, where, by the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, not one penny shall be paid for profit, but where the limit of cost shall only be increased by a sufficient amount to complete the contract, if there shall be an increase in the cost of labor and materials.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The Secretary says that that statement is absolutely not true; that he has not done it, and that he will not do it.

Mr. GOOD. I was told by Maj. Perry, supervising architect of the Public Health Service and in charge of this building program, this morning that the contract for the main building had been signed and that the other buildings would be built by day labor for $500,000.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The Comptroller of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Treasury say that that is not so.

Mr. GOOD. And Maj. Perry told me also that the contract had been signed, and that the Dawsonsprings Construction Co. had the contract—the very concern that Mr. Graff told us about when he said the president of the Dawsonsprings Construction Co. had told him he had an understanding with Mr. Doyle, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, that he should have all of the contracts, whether he was the lowest bidder or not. I want to say to the gentleman that the present sundry civil appropriation bill carries an appropriation of $123,000 to add to the marine hospital building in Chicago. Not a dollar has been expended; and yet, of all places in the United States, Chicago is most in need of hospital accommodations, and this appropriation was to provide for 43 additional beds. The gentleman from South Carolina brings here a proposition—and you must accept that or the proposition offered by the gentleman from Illinois—in which it is provided that the Secretary of the Treasury shall reject this contract and build a hospital there on the marine hospital grounds, or buy lands and build a new hospital. The marine hospital grounds are a small tract of land, with a frontage of 504 feet, extending back about 700 to 850 feet, with a long building on it now, and yet he proposes to build on that lot of ground, surrounded by apartment houses, a hospital, if you please, to take care of 1,000 of our soldiers! To build a new hospital—and you can not build a new hospital without paying profits, and profits on increased costs.

The gentleman from Illinois offers a motion to increase the limit of cost of the Broadview, but the motion of the gentleman from Illinois provided that no part of the authorized appropriation shall be paid in profits. In the one case we are to vote for profits and in the other we vote to secure a hospital without the payment of profits. Take your choice. I am sorry that it is necessary to increase this limit of cost, but I hold in my hand the publication of the labor organizations of Chicago in which they serve notice on the contractors that if any contract is entered into for a lump sum it should include the same provisions that it carried in this contract, and that is, that if there is an increase in the cost of labor or an increase in the cost of material after October 16, 1919, and the contractors are obliged to pay that increase, then and in that case the limit of cost shall be increased for enough to take care of it. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois specifically provides that not a penny of profit shall be paid to Mr. Hines or to the contractor.

What must Congress want? We have given all kinds of profits to the Army and Navy contractors, to contractors in the Treasury Department, and are asked to pay profits to some new contractors, but we say that we will not accept a building already partly constructed to house those boys who are sick, who carried the flag to imperishable glory, because, forsooth, the contractor agrees to build it without profit to the Government of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 81, nays 228, not voting 119, as follows:

Mr. SELLS with Mr. HUDSPETH.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No, I was not; I thought it was a point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 196, noes 24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 34.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

For the preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1920, $3,000,000.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I have a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit it.

Mr. TINKHAM. I desire to move that the House recede from the disagreement to Senate amendment No. 34 and agree to the same with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House recede from the disagreement to the Senate amendment No. 34 and agree to the same with an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That such parts of this appropriation as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy may be necessary may be applied to the objects of expenditure specified in the appropriations for various bureaus of the department for the fiscal year 1920.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. GOOD. It is legislation on an appropriation bill and not germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly in order to distinguish this amendment from the ruling which the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole made on this very paragraph, as the Chair remembers.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, the amendment is entirely distinct in that this provides a disposition of the various funds. It applies to the entire appropriation and its use, whereas the amendments which were offered when the bill was being originally considered were ruled out as not being germane. No point was raised in relation to its incompetence as legislation. In other words, the same point of order is not involved in any way.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the further point of order that the last proviso is unauthorized by law and that it introduces a new subject upon an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the points of order. The Chair thinks that clearly the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] extends this appropriation, which is made for yards and docks, over the whole Navy Department, and is subject to the ruling which was made in the committee on this subject.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I then desire to withdraw the amendment, and make a simple motion that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 34 and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 34 and concur.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say this: It is not my intention to curtail the right of debate at all on the items in this bill. Four or five roll calls have been had to-day by gentlemen who simply want to carry this bill over, which ought to get back into conference and become a law. Now, I have said to two of my colleagues on the committee that I would yield them five minutes each; but I propose after they have had five minutes apiece to take one minute and then move the previous question.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] has the floor.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, this is the same amendment which has been before this House three separate times. It is an amendment, although reduced in amount, providing an appropriation of $3,000,000, instead of $9,000,000, for the essential repair of ships of the line which have been in constant use during the war, and recommended not only as an emergency appropriation but one necessary for the national defense.

In the first deficiency bill the honorable Representative from Iowa stood before you and said that it was absolutely essential; that it was in the nature of economy, as the repairs had to be made; that there should be an allowance of $9,000,000. How can he stand here to-day and say with any consistency that $3,000,000 four months afterwards is not necessary? The amendment which now is before the House was proposed by Senator LODGE, the Republican leader of the Senate, and supported in several speeches, one by Senator KNOX of Pennsylvania and one by Senator POINDEXTER of Washington. Had I the time I would read the convincing reasons they all gave why the Republican leadership in this Congress, both the House and Senate, should support this essential appropriation for the rehabilitation of our Navy and in the interest of national defense. In the amendment you have only $3,000,000 for the essential repairs of ships of the line, which the very Appropriation Committee is now opposing who reported five months ago that $9,000,000 was not only necessary but in the interest of economy, as repairs must be made and the sooner they were made the less they would cost. Had I the time I should like to read the fervid address of the honorable Representative from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] for this purpose, who now is head and front of the opposition. The appropriation for $3,000,000 which I am proposing passed the Senate by unanimous vote, and only yesterday, after the disagreement with House conferees, by unanimous vote the Senate instructed their conferees to include the item in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I frankly state that I believe the Republican leadership in the Senate is wiser and more patriotic, as well as more intelligent, than the Republican leadership in this House, in relation to this item at least. It is not in the nature of economy to postpone the repairs which must be done, as the longer that such repairs remain undone, particularly in relation to naval construction, the greater will be the cost. The House is entirely inconsistent if it refuses that appropriation of $3,000,000 in view of its passing for the same purpose $9,000,000 five months ago. The opposition springs not from a spirit of economy but through blind following of bad leadership. The mistake should not be made.

I now yield, Mr. Speaker, one minute to the honorable Representative from New York [Mr. MAHER].

Mr. MAHER. Do you believe that it is good economy to refuse $3,000,000 for the repair of Government ships, while on last Saturday this House voted hundreds of millions of dollars to repair the property of the railroad owners of this country?

Mr. TINKHAM. I absolutely do not believe it is sound, consistent, or broad public policy.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. I have asked the gentleman to yield in order that I may express the hope that the motion of the gentleman will carry.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to read, now that it is brought to my attention, a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, to the honorable Representative from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, in relation to this appropriation:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 3, 1920.

MY DEAR MR. BUTLER: I feel that your constant interest in the welfare of the Navy has led you to give serious attention to the necessity of an immediate deficiency appropriation, as set forth in my letter of January 21 last to the Speaker of the House, with its accompanying letters from the Chief of Naval Operations and the Chiefs of the Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Yards and Docks (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 31, 1920).

In my frequent representations of the urgent need of additional funds for completing the essential postwar repairs and alterations on our capital ships and on the requisite destroyers, submarines, and other craft that go to make up a well-rounded fleet, I have tried to refrain from alarmist predictions and to present the case of the Navy's need in temperate language and without exaggeration. The detail facts are set forth in the correspondence referred to above, and I have been at personal pains to verify those facts. In the present condition of funds there is no possibility of completing work this fiscal year on 6 of our 15 dreadnoughts. None of our 13 predreadnoughts can be completed, nor any of the 7 armored cruisers which require repairs.

Certain changes necessary to bring the military efficiency of destroyers up to present-day standards can not be undertaken, and it will be impossible to place our submarines in a condition for effective action.

In the present unsettled condition of world affairs I do not believe it is possible, with safety, to delay repairs on these vessels until July 1 next, when the new appropriation for maintenance and upkeep becomes available, or to some indefinite date in the future, as is now the case. The discharge of 13,900 skilled workmen from our industrial yards, as it is estimated will be necessary if funds are not made available for essential military repairs, will seriously cripple our present industrial organization and necessitate later the slow rebuilding of a system which is now functioning effectively. I therefore strongly urge your good offices in presenting to the House these facts, which speak for themselves, with a view to securing the funds requested in the naval deficiency estimate.

I am sending a similar letter to Hon. L. P. PADGETT, of the committee.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. T. S. BUTLER, M. C.,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, now I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker, when this item for the maintenance and repair of ships of the Navy was first suggested, it was $9,300,000. At that time, in the first deficiency bill, it passed this House unanimously. When it went to conference the Senate conference committee urged an item of $20,000,000 for airplanes. The Navy was sacrificed to the extent of that appropriation as an offset to the airplane appropriation of $20,000,000. When the present deficiency bill was considered it was argued that if this item were placed in the bill, namely, $9,300,000 for the Navy, the Senate would strike it out. That did not happen. The Senate has inserted an item of $3,000,000 in this bill.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] presented that amendment; and without the slightest thought of reflecting on the policy of economy, as expressed by this House, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] said on the floor of the Senate that a policy of economy which meant to destroy or which meant to permit the deterioration of the ships of the American Navy was a cheeseparing policy. I want to go a shade further and say that, so far as I am concerned, I regard it as not only unwise but petty economy.

The Republican management of the House has started out to pare these bills below a certain percentage of the estimates. It seems to me that, having already pared this estimate to the extent of 67 per cent, they might with good grace say to this House, "We will permit this item of $3,000,000 to stay in the bill."

I appeal to my colleagues on this side of the House to make this appropriation of $3,000,000 at this time on this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, in making the statement about closing debate I did not intend to cut off my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. If he desires time, of course, I shall yield.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not desire any time.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, just a word about this item. It is as useless as the fifth wheel to a wagon unless we carry with it the other appropriations requested. [Applause.]

I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, asking that this appropriation, if made at all, be so made that he can spend it for all of the bureaus which have to carry on the work as it is carried on in the Navy. When the estimate was made for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, it called for $3,250,000. That was made in conjunction with a further estimate of $1,050,000 for the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, a further estimate of $2,500,000 for the Bureau of Steam Engineering, and a still further estimate of $2,500,000 for the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Now, this item has to do only with the hulls of the vessels. They could not expend a dollar of this money for steam engineering or for any of those other related purposes; it is a useless expenditure. It is a useless appropriation, because it could not be judiciously expended if appropriated. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VARE. Do I understand that those who wish to support the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] will vote "aye"?

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts will vote "aye."

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 91, nays 202, answered "present" 2, not voting 133, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 29, 1920.

The House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. WATKINS, of Louisiana].

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We are met, our Father in heaven, on this holy day, to fulfill a sacred duty which springs spontaneously from our hearts; that we may record for future generations the life, character, and achievements of a long-time Member of this House—a born gentleman, one of God's noblemen, who had convictions and dared to live them; a soldier, a statesman, a servant of his people in State and Nation.

At the age of 18 he enlisted in the Confederate Army and served throughout that long struggle with distinction—a brave and gallant soldier; and when the war ended laid down his sword and submitted to the inevitable with the same bravery and nobility of soul which characterized him as a soldier fighting for principles which he deemed right.

He took up the duties of life, became a man of affairs, a leader of men, and was chosen by his people for onerous duties in State and Nation—a loving husband, a tender father who gave to the great World War four stalwart sons. His work is done but his memory lives.

Comfort his family and friends with the immortal hope that sometime in the providence of God they shall meet in a land where sorrows never come, where love will be the crowning glory of a life eternal in one of God's many mansions where Christ has prepared a place for His own; and pæans of praise we will ever give to Thee, our God and our Father. Amen.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be deferred until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there is no objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order for the day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. O'CONNOR, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That memorial services shall be held on Sunday, February 29, 1920, on the life and character of Hon. ALBERT ESTOPINAL, deceased.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ESTOPINAL.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following resolutions, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. ALBERT ESTOPINAL, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, we have assembled here to-day in accordance with a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives, and in pursuance of a custom of parliamentary assemblies and legislative bodies, to commemorate the life, character, and services of the late ALBERT ESTOPINAL, Member-elect to this Congress from the first congressional district of Louisiana. This custom is derived from the past, and its origin is lost in the remoteness of time. For even from the twilight of history there come stories and traditions of great ceremonies and funeral rites suggesting the customs which we observe as a mode of expressing our grief and woe for the loss of those who at one time walked amidst us in glory.

From the antiquity of the customs which are observed among all people it would appear that there has always existed a tendency to reverence the dead and to give that tendency an outward form and expression. In Egypt's celebrated Book of the Dead, written more than two thousand years before Joseph was sold into captivity and long before the dawn of Judaism had begun, there appeared these sublime words:

He hath given bread to the hungry; clothes to the naked; He hath given a boat to the shipwrecked; He hath buried the dead; and made due offerings to the gods.

Whatever its origin may be it certainly has now and will always in all probability have a powerful appeal to the imaginations of those who are left behind to recall the memories that come back like burning stars to dissipate the gloom of the day when the lamented one departed for the unknown country from which no traveler ever returns.

In assembling here to pay tribute to his life, character, and services what a flood of memories comes to the minds of those that are in attendance in this historic part of the Capitol of the Nation. For Gen. ESTOPINAL was one whose splendid personality commanded the admiration of his generation and whose spirit appeals powerfully to the imagination of those that remember the part he played in the history of Louisiana, as a soldier, patriot, citizen, and legislator; and the reverence paid to him from his earliest years until he anwered the final summons as a man. "In his honor impregnable; in his simplicity sublime."

No State ever had a truer son, no cause a nobler champion, no principle a purer advocate, no people a bolder defender, than this magnificent Louisianian who stood foursquare to all the storms that life blew across the road over which he went with malice toward none and with charity to all.

Born and reared in the beautiful parish of St. Bernard and near the Plains of Chalmette, on which was fought the Battle of New Orleans, he passed his early youth amid surroundings that made for vision and that serene poise which characterized all his days. From his home he could view the Mississippi as it sweeps in majesty on its way to the Mexican Gulf and could see every day and night "the Riders to the Sea" that passed down the Father of Waters carrying the commerce of the valley to the uttermost parts of the earth. As a mere youth he answered the call of the Confederacy and donned the gray. He served "the Lost Cause" as a faithful soldier, but when the conquered banner took its flight at Appomattox to the field of blue above, he like all other southern soldiers followed the lead of the immortal Robert E. Lee and began to reconstruct, rebuild a wasted and ruined land. For the South was a land of ruins, as a result of those four years and more of fraternal strife. Perhaps no other land in the history of the world was ever the ruin that the Southland was in 1865.

From those ruins phœnixlike has sprung a new and not less glorious South, the marvel and wonder of an admiring world; and this great creation was the work of the survivors of "the Lost Cause."

We can never forget the ruin that it was; but we will recall that ruin in words which express the history of that period for the Southland wet with tears and choking with heart sobs; a ruin which showed that the South fought until all was lost but honor:

A land without ruins is a land without memories—
A land without memories is a land without history.

A land that wears a laurel crown may be fair to see; but twine a few sad cypress leaves around the brow of any land, and be that land barren, beautiless and bleak, it becomes lovely in its consecrated coronet of sorrow, and it wins the sympathy of the heart and of history. * * * Crowns of roses fade—crowns of thorns endure. Calvaries and crucifixions take deepest hold on humanity. The triumphs of might are transient—they pass away and are forgotten; the sufferings of right are graven deepest on the chronicle of nations.

As a member of the Louisiana Legislature, as the lieutenant governor of that great Commonwealth, as the chieftain of the Confederate Veterans of Louisiana, as a Representative in this Congress, his conduct was and is an inspiration to Louisianians "to do noble things, not dream them all day long, and so make life, death, and that vast forever one grand sweet song."

Brave, chivalrous, devoted, and tender, "the elements were so mixed in him that one might stand up and say to all the world: This was a man." He has passed away from earthly scenes; his remains are entombed in the old St. Louis Cemetery in New Orleans, where many another gallant Louisianian sleeps his last sleep. But the influence of his lifetime still walks abroad and makes for higher aspirations and nobler efforts in behalf of home and fireside, country, and its altars.

He was as true as steel and as fixed in purpose as the northern star is in the heavens. While his brave heart thrilled with pride at the memories and glories of the Old South, he accepted the arbitrament of the sword; and he gave to the Stars and Stripes the same unflinching, dauntless loyalty that he had shown for the conquered banner.

By precept and by example he taught the people "to weep no more"; to look to the rising sun, though they may cast a lingering, longing glance behind.

Sad, silent, and dark were the tears that he shed by the monument to Lee in New Orleans, and before that of Albert Sidney Johnston, but his great heart throbbed with an exultant patriotism at the sound of "America" and the sight of the symbol that to North, East, South, and West is the inspiration that kindles in the soul freedom's holy flame.

May it always be thus—a reunited people, baptized anew in the blood and tears of a fraternal conflict that tried men's souls, who will look with shining eyes and pulsing hearts to the flag of our country and say, in the sublime words of Ruth to Naomi, "Whither thou goest I will go; thy land shall be my land, and thy people shall be my people."

Brave and gallant ESTOPINAL—but no more. Tears, idle tears, can not avail. Our consolation lies in the beautiful lines of a great American poet—

Were a star quenched on high—
For ages would its light,
Still traveling downward from the sky
Shine on our mortal sight.
So when a great man dies
For years beyond our ken
The light he leaves behind him lies
Upon the paths of men.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to add a few words of affection and esteem of Gen. ESTOPINAL to the remarks of his other friends who have spoken touching his life and character.

Death has been busy among the Democratic membership of the House of the Sixty-sixth Congress—Sulzer of Alaska, Van Dyke of Minnesota, Burnett of Alabama, Ragsdale of South Carolina, Watson of Virginia, Thompson of Oklahoma, ESTOPINAL of Louisiana, ranging in age from Sulzer and Van Dyke, who were in the morning of life, to Gen. ESTOPINAL, whose span of life exceeded the psalmist's allotment of threescore and ten. So he had a long and useful existence—a benefaction to his country and his kind.

He was one of the best friends, personal and political, that I had in the House or out of it, and as such I sincerely mourn his departure from our midst. He was one of the most dependable of the sons of Adam, and dependableness is one of the most valuable of human characteristics. What he was he was—honest, honorable, kind, courteous, industrious, faithful as the needle to the pole.

He did his duty and did it well in all the relations of life. In his youth he was a volunteer soldier. In civil life he was sheriff, member of the legislature, State senator, member of the constitutional convention, lieutenant governor, and for many years a Representative in Congress. In every position he ever held he enjoyed the confidence of all who knew him and won both their respect and affection.

He was a modest man and was not much given to speechmaking, but he was a safe and sane counselor, active and valuable in committee work, and, so long as his health permitted, constant in his attendance on the sessions of the House.

He was a delightful companion, an interesting conversationalist, and his heart was as tender as a little child's. His large and varied experience in war and in peace had given him a vast mass of interesting reminiscences on which he drew freely in private association. His knowledge of French caused me while Speaker to call on him to translate communications in that language, which he did cheerfully and well.

Louisiana has contributed many men of note to the service of the Republic. Among these Gen. ESTOPINAL will hold a high place in the memory and hearts of the people of Louisiana. His splendid record is part of the priceless archives of the great State which heaped honors upon him and which he honored by his work and by his example.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] is recognized.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to-day to attempt to recite or to rehearse the entire scope of the varied activities of Gen. ESTOPINAL. Others who knew him and were associated with him in his own State and in the earlier activities of his life can speak more knowingly and more eloquently of these things than I. I shall content myself in speaking solely regarding him since my association with him some years ago in the House.

Gen. ESTOPINAL was a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, of which I was also a member. In that association we were thrown closely and intimately and, I rejoice to say, affectionately together. We were in that work so blended, so closely knit together, that I feel that our hearts often beat as one in the work and in the tasks assigned to us.

In speaking of him I wish to call attention to some of the traits of his character. As referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], he was decidedly and distinctly a modest man; modest in that high and generous and inspiring sense that commands our respect and our reverence. Gen. ESTOPINAL was a man of courtesy. Not only was he courteous, but he was chivalric. I do not think I ever knew a man who combined courtesy and chivalry more admirably than did Gen. ESTOPINAL. As the Chaplain said, he was a born gentleman. He was possessed of traits of character which lifted him in the esteem and in the confidence and in the affection of all who knew him. He was a courageous man—not demonstrative, not boastful, not egotistical. He had but little to say of or about himself or his convictions, and yet when duty presented itself to him, when a task came before him, he met it with a courage, with a conviction, with a firmness that challenged the admiration of all.

I know whereof I speak. I associated with him in the great work of the naval affairs and in the work of this House. Thrown closely in contact with him as I was, I know the true metal of which he was made. Modest, courteous, chivalric, courageous, having convictions, believing what he believed, and not afraid to express his convictions and to stand by his purpose, he was faithful to duty, and I do not know of any attribute of character that is more worthy of commendation or of emulation. Faithful to duty wherever and whenever that duty presented itself under any and all circumstances, Gen. ESTOPINAL realized the importance and appreciated the dignity of duty and of faithfulness and fidelity to duty. I dare say that it can never be charged against him that, knowing his duty, he had not the courage to meet it as a man.

He was generous in friendship, quiet, unassuming, unobtrusive, and yet his heart was full of the milk of human kindness and he had a high regard and a generous and noble estimation of friendship; and his character, his qualities of manhood, so diffused themselves that he drew his friends to him, and he so diffused the kindness and the generosity of his own life to others that in deed and in truth he was the friend worthy and deserving of the confidence, the esteem, and the friendship of all upon whom he would bestow it.

Gen. ESTOPINAL was a man of comprehensive patriotism, and in speaking of patriotism I use the word "comprehensive" intentionally. His patriotism was not limited to his parish, or to his borough, or to his State. His patriotism extended as far as his duty lay, as far as opportunity for its manifestation offered.

Broad, liberal, constructive, "no pent up Utica" contracted the powers of his patriotism, but, like the generous friendship of his heart, he had a generous, noble, comprehensive patriotism toward the whole length and breadth of our country. No narrow bigotry, no contracted sectionalism, characterized his conduct or his action. Having gone through that great struggle referred to, the Civil War, he came out tested and tried. He accepted the fact that it was one country, one flag, one love, and one patriotism, and that patriotism comprehended the length and breadth of our entire land.

Gen. ESTOPINAL possessed a splendid intellect. It was not that character of intellect that was scintillating and sparkling on the surface, but it was quiet, deep, and penetrating. He was able to grasp the problems, to fathom the depth of questions, and to arrive at correct solutions, so that his judgment was reliable, and his opinions challenged respect, reliance, and confidence.

He was a man of fine moral character. We do not say that he was perfect. None of us are. And yet I think Gen. ESTOPINAL had as delicate and as refined a sense of morals as any man with whom I was ever associated; the morals upon which the substance of our civilization rests; the morals that form the basis of our institutions; the morals that constitute the stamina and the substance of manhood.

Gen. ESTOPINAL had the qualities of moral character that were the basis of his life, his conduct, his demeanor, his citizenship, his character.

Gen. ESTOPINAL was also a religious man. He had a sensitive realization and appreciation of his relationship and his duty toward his Creator. He had a reverence for his Maker. He had a respect for the Almighty.

In all of our associations, he being a Catholic and I a Protestant, we never had discussions or controversies, but with him I may say, as I have grown older in years and more observant and of wider scope and association, I realize more sensibly and more appreciably, as the years come and go, the wisdom of what Peter said to Cornelius: "God is no respecter of persons, but in all nations he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of Him." And we in this age are glad to know that denominational lines and denominational prejudices are passing away, and that we are coming together more closely upon that great truth that God is no respecter of persons, that "he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of Him." I believe that truth was deep in the heart and in the affections of Gen. ESTOPINAL.

Full of years and full of honors, having the confidence and the respect of his people, having served them faithfully and well, having lived an honest and an honorable life, he laid himself down to sleep.

Mr. Speaker, Gen. ESTOPINAL had a wealth of character, a richness of soul, such as "moth nor rust could not corrupt, nor thieves break through nor steal"; a wealth of character and a richness of soul that form a wealth that he could take with him. When our loved ones go we say they can not take this or that or the other with them; but we rejoice to know that our loved ones can take with them the wealth of their characters and the richness of their souls.

Upon occasions like this, Mr. Speaker, when we stand at the graves or about the graves of our departed loved ones, I want to turn away from the darkness to the light; turn away from the evening to the coming morning, from the shadow toward the sunlight, from the night to the day, from the sunset to the sunrise. I think not of death but of life.

Mr. Speaker, it is upon occasions like this, when we think of our departed loved ones, that the words of the prophet of old come to us, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God, whom I shall see for myself, and not another."

These words become our words. They become our anchor, sure and steadfast, not idle words but firm convictions. Gen. ESTOPINAL in that faith, in that confidence, passed on. Sometimes we speak of our friends as being "no more." I never use those words. I do not believe them. They are more than ever they have been. They have more of life, more of opportunity, more of all that contributes to fullness and sweetness. They are not with us; they have only gone before. But in faith and in confidence we can say, in that better, that beautiful, life reserved for the noble characters of earth, wherever God has reserved a place for the noble characters of earth, they are there.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I am not present this morning in obedience to any convention, nor in compliance with any congressional proprieties, nor is there aught of perfunctoriness in what I shall say. I am here because I deeply mourn the death of Gen. ALBERT ESTOPINAL, and I speak out of a full heart. My relations with him were of the closest, not simply those that usually exist between colleagues from the same State, nor even those that naturally obtain between colleagues who represent the same city, whose public duties and interests are largely the same, whose political alignments are practically identical, and whose views regarding most of the questions that come before Congress coincide. I was bound to him by ties of affection. My dead father and he had been dear friends for many years, and often he reminisced with me about their associations. My mother and his wife were intimates. His nine sons were and are all my friends. It came to pass, then, that in spite of the disparity of our years, he and I enjoyed a close comradeship, unmarred by even the slightest breach. I was sure of him and he also knew where I stood. Half playfully, and yet I want to believe not altogether jocularly, he would sometimes call me his "tenth son." I thought always of him in a filial sense, and in that loving and reverential spirit I discharge this last sad office for him.

ALBERT ESTOPINAL had a very remarkable public career. He was born in the parish of St. Bernard, La., which adjoins the parish of Orleans and the city of New Orleans, and save for some four years' residence in that city he lived his entire life in the parish of his birth. Its good people began early to do him honor, and never ceased in appreciation of him. When but 27 years of age, he became sheriff of St. Bernard (1872) at a time when that office was calculated to test all a man's ability and courage. He was reelected in 1874 for another two-year term. In 1876 his people sent him to the house of representatives of the Louisiana Legislature, reelecting him in 1878, and he participated actively in the stirring times that included the Electoral Commission of 1876, and the recognition by President Grant of the first white government in Louisiana since the Civil War, captained by Francis Tillou Nichols, of blessed memory. St. Bernard sent him to the constitutional convention of 1879 that finally freed Louisiana from reconstruction misrule. In 1880 it demanded of the wards of the city of New Orleans and the adjacent parish of Plaquemines, which formed the same senatorial district, that he be sent to the State senate, and in that body he remained continuously a member until 1900—twenty years. Again, in 1898, St. Bernard sent him as its representative to the constitutional convention of that year. He was at various times president of its police jury, of its board of education, and its representative on various levee boards and drainage districts. For more than four decades he was the first citizen of St. Bernard.

But the Democracy of Louisiana was not content that he should receive merely these local honors and this recognition at the hands of his neighbors. It called him to broader, State and Nation-wide fields. He was made lieutenant governor in 1900, giving with William Wright Heard, governor, a sane, tranquil, and withal progressive administration of the affairs of that State. In 1908 he became chairman of the Democratic State central committee. In the fall of that year he was elected to membership in the 60th Congress, in succession to Gen. Adolph Meyer, deceased. He was reelected without opposition to the 61st, 62d, 63d, 64th, and 65th Congresses, and had been reelected to the 66th Congress when death overtook him on April 28, 1919.

Gen. ESTOPINAL'S tenure in this body, therefore, exceeded a decade. His service was characterized by punctual attendance on its proceedings, by high regard for its best ethics and traditions, and by never-wavering devotion to the interests of the people of the district and the State whom he represented. He was assigned to membership on the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which his predecessor, Gen. Meyer, had long been a member, and on which he served continuously.. At his death he was the ranking Democratic member of that committee, being next to Hon. LEMUEL P. PADGETT, of Tennessee, whose great service in behalf of the Navy entitles him to the affection of the American people. His eloquent and touching tribute to Gen. ESTOPINAL we have all just listened to with appreciation. Outranking Congressman ESTOPINAL on that committee for a short time before the latter's death was Capt. J. F. C. Talbot, of Maryland, another Confederate veteran, who shared my colleague's views on the Navy.

Between these two—par nobile fratrum—existed deep and beautiful friendship. Gen. ESTOPINAL'S really last public appearance was at the funeral of "Uncle Fred" Talbot. He was advised not to attend on that occasion, but he insisted, and he was rather difficult to control. He realized that it would not be long before he would rejoin his old comrade at a reunion on the other shore, and he did not want to be absent when "taps" were sounded at this last earthly tribute to his brother in arms.

I have already mentioned that Congressman ESTOPINAL, on his entrance into this body, became a member of the Naval Affairs Committee. It was then, as now, one of the most important assignments in the House, and membership thereon then, as now, was eagerly sought after. To that work Gen. ESTOPINAL gave the best that was in him. He never looked upon the American Navy from a local or a party standpoint. He regarded it as a much bigger question. Indeed, he and I, and I am proud of the fact, as he was, frequently supported larger appropriations for the Navy than our associates on either side of the aisle were willing to support, and subsequent developments showed that we were right. As a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, Representative ESTOPINAL rendered valuable service to the country at large, to the Gulf ports, to the city of New Orleans, and to the Algiers Navy Yard, which is located in that city.

Among his last official acts, Truman H. Newberry, Secretary of the Navy under Theodore Roosevelt, had closed by Executive order on March 3, 1909, the Algiers Navy Yard. He was succeeded by George von Lengerke Meyer, Secretary of the Navy under Mr. Taft, who persistently refused to rescind Secretary Newberry's order, in spite of many protests to him and many appeals for redress. When I came to Congress in December, 1910, I joined Gen. ESTOPINAL in these protests and appeals to Secretary Meyer. We made repeated visits to the department, and discussed the matter on innumerable occasions with Secretary Meyer, who always treated us with courtesy, but was unyielding in his opposition. I remember our parting interview. Gen. ESTOPINAL, who was the very pink of politeness, arose, bowed to Secretary Meyer, and said, "Well, we will have to get rid of you before the Algiers yard will be opened." He was right. The rebirth of the American Navy had taken place under William C. Whitney, a Democratic Secretary of the Navy, and when another Democratic administration came into power, the Secretary of the Navy, Josephus Daniels, in conformity with many recommendations of Navy boards, rescinded the Newberry order, and the Algiers yard was reopened. How wise a thing that was was realized when came the declaration of war between England and Germany, and long before we became involved in the conflict the wisdom of that order was vindicated beyond question. The public service that Representative ESTOPINAL rendered to the American Navy is something that should endear him to all of those who feel that the Navy is the first line of national defense.

Mr. Speaker, no one who served in this House with Gen. ESTOPINAL can forget him. He was a very striking figure, more than 6 feet tall, carrying himself erectly and a bit cavalierly—an unusually handsome man. He had about him a singular charm and grace of manner. He was American born, and his forebears for many generations were likewise. But there ran through his veins the purest Castilian blood, and he had all of the courtesy that attaches to this strain. He was, however, never the haughty Don. His courtesy was innate, natural, never assumed. I do not think I have ever known a man who was more truly a gentleman.

My friend was blessed with unusual domestic happiness. In his young manhood he was married to Miss Eliska Legier, and the bride of his youth lived to celebrate with him the golden anniversary of their wedding. It was beautiful to see them "grown old together," and our sympathies flow warmly to her in her great bereavement. Sixteen children were born of their union, ten of whom grew to maturity. Of his nine sons—his "baseball nine," as he was wont to call them—the General was very proud. There was an only daughter who never married, and those of us who knew her and her attachment and devotion to her mother and father realize that her death was the greatest sorrow that ever came into the life of her parents.

I have been frequently asked as to the reason why Mr. ESTOPINAL was always referred to as "General" ESTOPINAL, or, as was the custom among his associates, "the general." This is the explanation: In 1862, then 17 years of age, he enlisted in the Confederate Army. He joined the Twenty-eighth Louisiana Volunteers, commanded by Gen. Allen Thomas, which gallant body of troops surrendered with the fall of Vicksburg. Pvt. ESTOPINAL a short time before had been sent on a mission to Richmond, which fact alone prevented him from surrendering with his comrades when Vicksburg fell. He immediately returned to the colors with the Twenty-second Louisiana Regiment, under Col. I. W. Patton, and served until the end of the war, surrendering to Gen. Canby at Meridian, Miss., in May, 1865.

Privately and publicly he never forgot his brother veterans of the Lost Cause, and in 1905 they chose him as commander-in-chief of the Louisiana Division of the Confederate Veterans, with the rank of general. In that capacity he was host to the great reunion, held in New Orleans in 1906, of the United Confederate Veterans—one of the most memorable gatherings that ever took place in that historic city. When the U. C. V. met here in Washington some years ago, Gen. ESTOPINAL led the Louisiana contingent, and a gallant and martial figure he was à cheval on that occasion. He was thrown from his horse while the parade was in formation, and some of us have always thought that this fall brought on the illness from which he died. It happened that his colleague and mine, Representative RILEY J. WILSON of Louisiana, was passing the spot where this accident happened, and wanted to take Gen. ESTOPINAL to a hospital or at least to his home, but the old warrior scorned such a suggestion, and insisted on following the line of march in Congressman WILSON'S motor until its completion. Such a course was characteristic of him. He would disregard all personal consequences; where his brothers in gray were was his place.

Mr. Speaker, a day or two before he did, le bon Père Bourrendon, who was his friend and neighbor and pastor, called to see him, as was his custom in sickness as in health, and the general said to him: "Vous savez, je suis un vieux combattant"—"You know, I am an old fighter." He was right. He belonged to the Church Militant. He fought all of his days. As a youth he fought for the Confederacy. After peace he fought for the people of his parish and his homeland. All through the horrid era of reconstruction he was in the forefront of the combat. He warred against the forces of evil and ignorance; he gave inestimable aid to the cause of education in his parish and district and State. He even warred against nature, because there was never an outbreak of the Mississippi River, which passed by his very doors, that he did not share the dangers and hardships in an effort to stop the ravages of this stream, and what he did for the redemption of his section by his fight for the organization and maintenance of levee boards in our State, and for the reclamation of now splendid land in St. Bernard, through the establishment of model roads therein, all of us know. Until his last gasp he fought sham, hypocrisy, duplicity, double-dealing of every sort, private and public.

Is it too much to hope that after such service in the Church Militant, a risen Christ, in whom he always believed, granted him fellowship in the Church Triumphant? So believing, I say to this valiant soldier, this knightly gentleman, this loyal citizen, this wise lawgiver, this faithful friend, this devoted father, this tender and affectionate husband, "Ave atque vale"—"Hail and farewell!"

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, Gen. ALBERT ESTOPINAL'S life should be an inspiration to young men everywhere. He was clean of mind and pure in heart. His ideals were lofty and his purpose always noble. As a man he was a prince among men, suave, gracious, courtly, and dignified. No one ever doubted his sincerity or questioned his integrity. He never quibbled or dodged.

High-spirited and courageous, he feared no man; yet considerate and forgiving, he loved his fellow man with a passionate love. Modest to the point of timidity, his personality commanded respect and impelled admiration. To know him was to love him; to work with him was to trust and follow him; to think of him now is to praise and honor him.

A gallant and fearless Confederate soldier of unfaltering bravery during the Civil War, a trusted public officer for 47 years, no man ever enjoyed more continuous love and confidence than did ALBERT ESTOPINAL in Louisiana.

His was a successful life, filled with service and devotion to his family, to his people, to his country. A loving and dependable father, husband, and friend, a noble soul, was ALBERT ESTOPINAL—a statesman and patriot, heroic in peace, courageous in war!

We mourn with his bereaved family, but we console them with the reflection that his long and honorable career leaves behind him for them a brilliant record of distinguished service of which they and the whole country may well be proud.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, we are gathered together to pay those tributes to the memory of a departed friend which are prompted by the affectionate regard in which he was held in this body.

Gen. ESTOPINAL was born January 30, 1845, at St. Bernard, La., and lived there all of his life.

The district which he for so long a time represented is made up of a territory as historic as any spot of like dimensions in the United States. It was in that territory that the memorable battle of New Orleans was fought January 8, 1815, in which Gen. Jackson, with a citizen army, defeated the trained heroes of Wellington, commanded by Gen. Packenham.

Gen. ESTOPINAL was worthy, both personally and officially, of the fine traditions and spirit of that great section from whence he came. Physically he was well-nigh perfect in proportion and build. His features were of finest line, his bearing was one of gracious dignity and unostentatious knightliness, his gentlemanliness came from the heart out. It was inbred; it was the warp and woof of his spirit. Intellectually I think we must justly say that he was profound. He had a thoroughly disciplined mind. He was broad-minded, practical, and quick. He was a close student of history. I don't mean simply that he knew history; I mean that he understood it. He caught the significance of events as applied to human life and destiny. He was honest and sincere and detested hypocrisy. He believed in his country and its Constitution, and his Americanism was 100 per cent. Thus, Mr. Speaker, he was prepared to be, and was, a god lawmaker, understanding life, knowing human nature, having information of the past which was accurate, and being able to analyze with quick and usually unfailing accuracy the significance of great activity; he was prepared for his work, and he did it well.

As a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs he was a strong advocate of a large and efficient navy as a line of defense. He was a man of intense convictions. When he felt in committee, in his office, or on the floor of the House that he was being obstructed for any purpose that was not sincere and in good faith, he was quick to resent it.

When I came to this House in 1912 I learned to like Gen. ESTOPINAL. I saw him when he was taken sick and frequently after that in his office and at home, and I shall never forget how philosophically he accepted his illness. Although he suffered constantly, he was always glad to see his friends. He was always courteous and patient to the last. Gen. ESTOPINAL was one of the most lovable men I ever met, in his home. He was a man of tender sentiment, graceful in personality, gracious in his temperament and demeanor, and a chivalrous, splendid, knightly gentleman. Gen. ESTOPINAL'S death was a loss, not only to his family and his friends, but to the State of Louisiana, which he loved so truly, and to the United States.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, it was in 1882 that I first met Gen. ALBERT ESTOPINAL. I was then a student at the Louisiana State University and had as a roommate the general's eldest son, Albert, who is now sheriff of St. Bernard Parish, La. At that time Gen. ESTOPINAL was a State senator, so that during the sessions of the legislature he was a frequent visitor at the university. I was thus thrown in intimate contact with him and often listened with profit to his fatherly advice. I grew to love Gen. ESTOPINAL from the very beginning, being impressed with his kindly, courteous manner, his strong, sincere personality, and the qualities of political leadership which made for him, even at that time, a place of distinction in the administration circles of our State.

Having been appointed enrolling clerk of the State senate a few years later, I came to know him better in his public rôle, and there I had occasion to see more of this forceful man, whose qualities of statesmanship made him so popular with the masses. He had no enemies. He was so fair, so upright, and so sincere in all his public dealings and utterances that even those who differed with him politically admired and loved him.

When I came to Congress several years ago, like all new Members I felt the need of advice and encouragement. Among the older Members who manifested some interest in me and who won my sincere gratitude was the generous soul in whose memory we are to-day gathered here.

Gen. ESTOPINAL was a gentleman of the old school. He was a tender husband, a loving father, a sincere friend, and a chivalrous gentleman. He loved the South. Even before he had reached the age of majority, and while he was still in school, his mother State called upon her sons to defend her cause upon the battle field and he answered the call to undergo the greatest suffering and hardships. His duty done on the battle field, he returned home, like so many thousands of young men, to enlist in the army of reconstruction, the remarkable achievements of which is one of the most brilliant and inspiring pages in the history of our country.

Almost his entire life was spent in the service of his people. As sheriff, as State legislator, as State senator, as lieutenant governor, and as congressman from the first district of Louisiana, Gen. ESTOPINAL served his people faithfully and conscientiously and with great ability.

That his scions have proved worthy of their sire was shown by the fact that four of his sons served their country with distinction in the great World War. While the general had himself fought on the Confederate side in the Civil War, yet, when the cause of the South was lost, he took defeat like a true soldier and thereafter became loyal to the victorious flag of the Union. He was proud of the fact that four of his sons had served under the Stars and Stripes, and often expressed regret that he was too old to join his sons in the fighting for liberty and democracy.

The character and fortitude of Gen. ESTOPINAL was shown by an incident which happened in Washington a few years ago. There was a convention of Confederate Veterans here and the General was given a place of honor in the parade which was to pass up Pennsylvania Avenue to be reviewed by the President at the White House. Despite his seventy-odd years, he took his place on horseback at the head of the Louisiana Veterans. Just as the parade started, his horse became frightened and in the struggle Gen. ESTOPINAL was thrown violently to the ground. Badly shaken, with several bones fractured, this soldier refused to be taken to a hospital, but remained in the parade until it had passed the reviewing stand. The General never fully recovered from that fall and it is believed that it hastened the end of a career of usefulness and public service.

The greatest tribute to the man was shown by the attendance at his funeral. From every part of the State came men who had known him in his long public life and none came but to praise. But most impressive of all was the large number of the poor who gathered at his bier to pay tribute to a man whose charity and generosity they so well remembered. Even the darkies, many of them former slaves, followed timidly behind the cortége to the grave.

Of him it can be truly said: He was a soldier, a statesman and a patriot.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, Gen. ALBERT ESTOPINAL might well be termed the typical Louisianian. In his veins ran the blood of the pioneer settlers of the Louisiana Territory and the founders and builders of the first white man's civilization along the banks of the lower Mississippi. He was born in St. Bernard Parish in 1845, receiving his early education there and in the city of New Orleans. The outbreak of the Civil War cut short his course at college. While yet in his eighteenth year young ESTOPINAL joined the forces of the Confederate Army, serving first with the 28th Louisiana Volunteers and later with the 22d Louisiana Regiment, being with this latter command at the time of the surrender in 1865. His record in the war was that of a brave and gallant soldier, loved and honored by his comrades.

The war over, Gen. ESTOPINAL returned to his Louisiana home, Actuated by the same quality of patriotism, the same devotion to principle, the same lofty impulses to the discharge of duty that had led him to the battle front when Louisiana took her stand with her sister States of the South, he now set to work with his fellows for the readjustment and rebuilding of the industrial and governmental structure of his community and State. This work of rebuilding and reestablishing government and industries in the Southern States after the close of the Civil War required if possible more heroic courage, a higher degree of sacrifice, and more enduring patience than that which was exercised in defending their cause on the battle field.

The ruin was all but complete. The government they had so recently established was overthrown, credit was destroyed, and money worthless. Industries and business were paralyzed. To men of ordinary type the situation would have appeared hopeless, yet the adverse verdict of the battle field was accepted in good faith and as having closed the issues involved in the desperate struggle. The Confederate soldier, with courage, fortitude, and patriotism unsurpassed in history, undertook the rebuilding of his country, the reestablishment of his local government, and the reorganization of his social fabric. In this work in Louisiana Gen. ESTOPINAL, by virtue of his native ability, naturally became a leader, and remained a leader in the affairs of his State and Nation until the day of his death.

Shortly after his return from the war he engaged in the mercantile business in New Orleans, but soon sold out and took up his residence in his native parish of St. Bernard, where he became a planter. His interest in public affairs soon led him into the field of politics. He was elected sheriff of St. Bernard Parish in 1872, and he was reelected for a second term. In 1876 he was elected a member of the State legislature and in 1880 to the State senate and in 1900 as lieutenant governor of the State. He was also a member of the constitutional conventions of 1879 and 1898. In 1908 he was elected a Representative in Congress from the first Louisiana district and was reelected for each successive term up to and including the Sixty-sixth Congress. His public career at Washington, as in Louisiana, was characterized by a comprehensive grasp of the questions with which he had to deal, and untiring efforts for the advancement of every interest of his district, State, and country.

He was in the true sense a constructive statesman and was among the first to warn the American people of the dangers to our national safety and security involved in the failure to provide and equip an adequate and efficient navy, one commensurate with our own needs, and without reference to any other Nation.

Gen. ESTOPINAL was a most engaging and attractive personality—handsome in stature, polished in manner, kindly and courteous always, and by nature true and genuine.

He was a loyal friend and a safe counselor, one whose advice always came devoid of any tinge of personal interest.

In 1868 he married Miss Eliska Legier, of New Orleans, who, with nine sons, survives him. Four of these sons were volunteers in the late war, the youngest being 25 years of age. They have all been important factors in their community and State, and are worthy descendants of their honored parents.

The home and family life of Gen. ESTOPINAL was beautiful and ideal. The American home is the unit of American civilization; and after all, here in the home and family circle is the final, the acid test, of a man's unfaltering devotion to the highest duty and of his faithfulness in those better and finer things of life that form the true basis and hope of our civilization.

Mr. Speaker, the relentless hand of death has removed our friend and colleague from the scenes of earthly contests and activities. Yet he lives in the record of his service to his fellow man, to his State, and to his country; he lives in a noble example of unselfish devotion to principle and loyalty to the cause of truth, right, and justice; he lives in the memory and fond recollections of his friends; he lives enshrined in the hearts of those who loved him. And thus continues the work, the influence, and the life of the just and upright man.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, my association with Gen. ESTOPINAL was as close, if not closer, than any other man in Louisiana. The first time I ever met the general, as we all loved to call him, was when I was elected to the legislature in 1892. The two most striking figures in the State senate at that time was Gen. ESTOPINAL, of St. Bernard, and Senator C. C. Cordell, of Tensas. I had just reached my majority. Both of those gentlemen had been in the State senate for a number of years, both had been in the Confederate Army, and some way, somehow, I became intimate with them both, an intimacy only ended by death.

I kept up my acquaintance with Gen. ESTOPINAL year after year. We served together in the Legislature of Louisiana until 1898, and we were both, in that year, elected to the constitutional convention in Louisiana that solved the suffrage problem. In 1900 I had the honor of supporting Gen. ESTOPINAL for lieutenant governor. In 1907, when I became a candidate for governor, Gen. ESTOPINAL became the manager of my campaign. Upon the success of my candidacy he became the chairman of the Democratic State central committee, and a short time thereafter was elected to Congress. Gen. ESTOPINAL and my father were together in the Confederate Army. They went through the siege of Vicksburg together. They had practically the same experience, both of them having been detailed a few weeks before Vicksburg fell, and therefore neither of them were surrendered there, but joined other Confederate commands and stayed in the war until its close. Gen. ESTOPINAL was one of the men of the South who did their full duty in the conflict between the States and then returned to their homes. We, their sons, love to read of the glory and the valor of our fathers on the battle fields of the South. And yet sometimes it seems to me that the Confederate soldier showed more heroism after the war, when they returned home and found that the very fabric of their civilization had been swept away, found chaos where there had once been order, poverty where once plenty had been, their civilization gone, their country in ruins, when they faced the new conditions and new surroundings and out of the wreck and ruin of a country builded up the splendid empire of the South that we their sons enjoy to-day. It seems to me, gentlemen of the House, that the Confederate soldiers performed a task after the war as glorious as that which they had performed on the battle field itself.

Gen. ESTOPINAL was my friend. I was his. There was never any difference between us, either personal or political. I loved him, and I am proud of the fact that I enjoyed his friendship. I have known all of his family since a boy. They are a splendid people.

Gen. ESTOPINAL's parish of St. Bernard was probably the most unique county in the United States. There never was any opposition to the general in his home parish. There was never any opposition to any man whom he supported in his home parish. Every man and woman in St. Bernard respected, admired, and loved Gen. ESTOPINAL. I never will forget the funeral service in the courthouse of St. Bernard Parish. Practically the entire population of the parish was there. There was not a dry eye in that whole assembly. Men and women wept and were not ashamed of the tears that coursed down their cheeks. Little children who did not understand the solemnity of the occasion showed their strained feelings in their faces. It was perchance the most unique and wonderful funeral that has ever been held in the State of Louisiana. The people of his parish followed the funeral cortege up to the city of Orleans, where he was placed in the family vault. Gen. ESTOPINAL is gone, but yet he lives in the hearts of his people, for whom he worked so long and so faithfully. St. Bernard Parish is one of the most beautiful parishes in our State to-day.

Its educational, its drainage, its public road systems are all due to the industry, courage, splendid ability, and perseverance of the man in whose memory we are gathered here to-day. Gone, but not forgotten. His work and his life will stand as a monument and example to those who come after him. A splendid soldier in time of war, a splendid citizen in time of peace. He was a leader in battle and in civil life. He was a man of whom every Louisianian is proud. He was a citizen who will be sadly missed in our State, and a leader for whom we will long seek to find a successor.

Soldier, citizen, patriot, statesman, you fought the good fight, you kept the faith, and firmly and fervently we believe you have entered into your reward.

Here Mr. DUPRÉ took the chair.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, my conception of the scope that eulogies should take is that they should set forth with accuracy the characteristics of the person who is being eulogized.

It had been my intention this morning, on account of my long personal friendship and association in this House with Gen. ESTOPINAL, to make a few remarks.

I have listened with close attention and with great interest to these eloquent eulogies which have been pronounced in his memory, and just at this time I can not recall any incident in his private life or in his public career, of which I have knowledge, but has already been referred to. Therefore, I do not see that there is anything which I can add to the eulogies which have been pronounced. It is possible that later on I may think of something that I would like to insert in the RECORD. There are some, Mr. Speaker, who are absent to-day, who would like the same privilege. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that all the Members who desire to do so may extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and asks like permission for other Members. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WATKINS). The resolution which has already been adopted provides an adjournment at the end of the pronouncement of the eulogies for to-day. If there is no other Member to ask recognition, in conformity with the resolution the House will stand adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT.

Thereupon, in conformity with the resolution previously agreed to, the House (at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) adjourned until Monday, March 1, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 1, 1920.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.:

Almighty God, our sense of need moves us to prayer. It is not danger or want of power, but a fear that we may come short of Thy law. Through all the vain conflict of human interests there runs the golden thread of a divine purpose. Victory through love is the only achievement worthy of the sons of God. Teach us to overcome evil with good. May we not fear to trust ourselves and our Nation to the divine program. Greater is he that ruleth his own spirit than he that taketh a city. So may we be the true heroes in the world's strife through the glorious victory of self-mastery. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Friday, February 27, 1920, was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

THE FIUME QUESTION.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD an article by Frank H. Simonds, published in yesterday's New York Tribune, on the Fiume question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the New York Tribune, Feb. 29, 1920.]

ARGUMENTS FOR AND AGAINST ITALY'S CLAIMS TO FIUME—JUGO-SLAVS, UNDER THE DOCTRINE OF SELF-DETERMINATION, HAVE RIGHT TO THE PORT—THE TREATY OF 1915 WITH FRANCE AND GREAT BRITAIN CONTAINED THIS CONCESSION.

(By Frank H. Simonds.)

"The peculiar value of the Fiume episode at the present hour lies in the extent to which it serves to shed light upon the character of the great American adventure in Europe. Examining this incident in all of its various phases, one may see how difficult and how complicated is the task which President Wilson undertook at Paris, the task of imposing American ideas upon Europe.

"To begin at the beginning, Fiume is a purely Italian town, situated in a wholly Slavonic region, surrounded on three sides by Slav populations, which, in fact, constitute a considerable minority within its limits. On the fourth side is the sea. Historically, Fiume has only the remotest association with Italy, having been for centuries connected with Austria or with Hungary, and in recent times a Crown possession of the Hungarian Kingdom.

NATURAL SLAV PORT.

"Commercially and economically it is the natural port of the vast Slav and Magyar regions which constitute its immediate and remoter hinterland, and it is one of the two ports by which all the districts which were included within the Hapsburg empire must communicate with the outside world. The other port, Trieste, is already in Italian hands. Even in the case of Trieste, however, the Slavonic claim is worthy of note, because all the populations surrounding the town are Slav, and Trieste has a large and growing Slovenian minority.

"The Italian claim to Fiume rests upon the fact that within the narrow limits of the town a majority of the people are Italian. Under a strict interpretation of the 14 points self-determination might establish Italian rights. But, on the other hand, the real desire of the Italians is founded upon the wish to dominate the Adriatic coast, to control the two ports of the Slav hinterland, and thus to establish economic and political control of this portion of the world.

"If Fiume were to pass out of Italian hands it would at once become the formidable rival of Trieste, and it is by no means certain that this would not spell the ruin of Trieste, because the Slavs naturally would use Fiume and Trieste would be deprived of its commerce. It would lie within Slav power, since the Jugo-Slavs control the whole hinterland, with its railways, to divert all traffic to Fiume, and Trieste would perish.

"By contrast, if Italy gained control of both of the available ports of Jugo-Slavia, that country would be economically at the mercy of Italy. Nor is the Italian insistence upon the availability of other ports worth discussing. The character of the country, which is mountainous, forbids the construction, save at prohibitive costs, of any alternative railway line. Actually, if the Italians acquire both Fiume and Trieste, they have Jugo-Slav commerce at their mercy.

MR. WILSON'S STAND.

"In this situation President Wilson's opposition to the original proposal that Italy have Fiume is understandable; is, in fact, unassailable, as a question of right and wrong. A country of 11,000,000 people, as large as Italy in area and destined to have a population nearly as large in a future not too distant, can not safely be deprived of a sea gate or placed in economic subjection to the Italians. Moreover, if the population of Fiume, less than 30,000, contains a majority of Italians, very large areas with a purely Slav population have been assigned to Italy on grounds which could be cited to warrant Jugo-Slav claims to Fiume.

"Unfortunately the naked question of right or wrong has little to do with the larger aspects of the question. In 1915, when Great Britain and France needed Italian aid, they made a secret treaty with the Italian Government by which they promised Italy the Austrian territory in the Trentine and Tyrolese districts, as far north as the Brenner Pass, Trieste, and the Istrian Peninsula, the northern half of Dalmatia, and certain other things in Albania and Asia Minor.

"All this was done long before the 14 points were even born. Italy accepted the promise, entered the war, and performed her part of the bargain. She therefore feels entitled to claim her reward, and, looked at purely as a contractual obligation, neither France nor Britain has the smallest warrant to decline to carry out the agreement of 1915.

OTHER ITALIAN DEMANDS.

"But when the matter was raised at Paris, President Wilson firmly opposed the performance by Britain and France of their contract. His opposition was based upon the solid foundation that this meant placing many hundreds of thousands of Slavs under Latin rule, depriving them of their own nationality, and also depriving the Slavs of the hinterland of access to the sea. A more flagrant break with the 14 points was not conceivable.

"Meantime the Italians on their side had formulated other demands. In their agreement with the British and the French they had left Jugo-Slav claims to Fiume unquestioned. But this concession had aroused protest in certain Italian quarters, and for reasons of domestic politics it became necessary for the ministry of the hour to advance claims to Fiume also. These claims were based upon the 14 points upon the right of self-determination. In Paris, therefore, the Italians claimed Istria and Dalmatia, on the Slav hinterland of Trieste, on the basis of the Anglo-French bargain, the treaty of London of 1915. But they claimed Fiume on the basis of self-determination.

ITALIAN CLAIMS.

"This opened a way for compromise. France and Great Britain had no wish to oppose President Wilson; they had no private or selfish interest in advancing Italian claims. They were merely bound by a bargain; if they could be released from the bargain they would welcome the escape. But if they could not refuse to stand by the treaty of London they could honorably insist that the whole treaty be enforced, and that, while Dalmatia was assigned to Italy, Fiume should be turned over to the Jugo-Slavs.

"To this the Italians at Paris could not consent, because it merely convicted them at home of weakness and insured the fall of the ministry. While this debate was still in progress Mr. Wilson appealed to the Italian people over the head of Orlando, expecting they would see the injustice of their position and compel the ministry to abandon its stand. Instead, the country rallied to these claims and the ministry fell, precisely because it had not made good the demands.

"Italy then withdrew from the peace conference, but presently resumed participation, while the Adriatic solution was postponed. Before it could be settled d'Annunzio, scenting weakness in certain official quarters and receiving encouragement in others, made his descent upon Fiume, seized it, and continues to hold it. He is thus, in theory, a rebel against Italian authority, but the Government does not dare interfere, because the army and navy sympathize with him.

PEACE IN DANGER.

"This Fiume adventure, however, brought the peace of Europe into immediate danger. The Serbs, the Croats, the Slovenes, with strong military forces, were only deterred from actually opposing Italian aggression by military operation by the promise of the great powers that they should have justice, accompanied by warnings that if they resorted to arms they would get nothing.

"Meanwhile the Italians had recourse to many devices. They sought to break up the soldiarity of the Serbs, the Croats, and the Slovenes by intrigue; they endeavored to prevent the union of Montenegro with Serbia, using old King Nicholas as a tool. When the plebiscite in Montenegro on the union was taking place they endeavored to send a regiment to the Montenegrin capital, and were prevented only by the daring intervention of an American naval officer.

"At the same time they made common cause with the Roumanians, who opposed the cession of part of the Banat to the Serbs, a cession ordered by the Paris conference. Italian influence was also exerted to stir up both Bulgar and Hungarian hostility to the Jugo-Slavs—an easy thing, because the Paris conference had assigned both Bulgar and Hungarian lands to the Jugo-Slavs. Thus a situation was created and survives in which a clash between the Jugo-Slavs and the Italians may have as a consequence attacks upon Jugo-Slavia by both the Roumanians and the Bulgarians and a campaign which will set all of the south of Europe in flames again.

CAMPAIGN OF BITTERNESS.

"At the same time Italy pursued a campaign against her old allies, the French and the British, and particularly against the French, because these two nations accepted President Wilson's policy instead of assenting to the Italian claims. Many French soldiers, occupying portions of the Adriatic coast under orders from the Paris conference, were actually murdered, and a press campaign of unparalleled bitterness was carried on against France.

"For Britain, as for America, this Italian bitterness had no real threat, but for France it was quite different. In case of another war with Germany, France would be menaced by an Italian attack along the Alps, and it was only Italian neutrality which saved France in 1914 by enabling the French to concentrate all their troops in the north. It was this detail which totally wrecked German combinations and led directly to the defeat of the first Marne.

"France could afford to stand with Britain and the United States against Italian claims if it were clear that Britain and the United States would stand with France in case of a new German attack. But when the President returned to Washington it became clear that there was no real chance that America would undertake to defend France against German attack, while Britain declined to undertake the task without American cooperation.

"France thus found herself estranged from two Latin States—Italy and Roumania—because of her acceptance of Wilson leadership, but without any commensurate reward in the way of security. Consequently there developed a strong French sentiment in favor of changing sides and standing with the Italians, while both in Britain and in France there was a general demand that there be some settlement of a situation which threatened to be the occasion of a new war and, while unsettled, prevented actual peace in all of southern Europe.

PROPOSAL REJECTED.

"At first a solution satisfactory to President Wilson and to Italy was sought, but the proposal accepted by Mr. Polk for the President was rejected by Italy. Thereafter Mr. Polk left Europe, and the President became ill. In this situation Britain and France, acting without the United States, proposed a settlement which Italy accepted. Then both States served notice upon the Jugo-Slavs that they must accept this or submit to seeing the old treaty of London imposed, which meant the loss of all of Dalmatia.

"The compromise was far more favorable to the Jugo-Slavs than any previous proposal. It gave them all of Dalmatia and most of the islands, with certain restrictions as to Zara, but it placed Fiume under the League of Nations and in addition gave the Italians a strip of Slav coast land, thus enabling them to have access over their own territory to the Fiume district. As a compromise it was not unreasonable, but the main criticism was that Great Britain and France ordered the Jugo-Slavs to accept it or accept the treaty of London as the alternative. But President Wilson had expressly refused to recognize the treaty of London, he had not been consulted as to the compromise, and he was free, if he chose, to follow exactly the course he took, namely, to warn Europe against a compromise in the manufacture of which America was ignored, but in the future results of which Mr. Wilson conceived America would be concerned under its League of Nations duties.

"The result was an international crisis. The British from the outset had no intention of sacrificing American association for Italian demands. The French preferred American to Italian assurance, but had to have one or the other, and were beginning to conclude that only the Italian was obtainable. The Italians were naturally furious and angrily defiant, while the Slavs, reenforced by this powerful American support, naturally ignored the ultimatum.

CHAOTIC SITUATION.

"Thus the situation reverted to chaos. Jugo-Slavia renews demands which can be ignored only in defiance of President Wilson and with the obvious probability that such defiance will lead to the recall by the President of both the treaty of Versailles and the Anglo-French-American treaty. But Britain and France promised Italy certain things under the treaty of London, and recently pledged themselves to abide by the terms of the latest compromise and compel the Jugo-Slavs to accept it. Italy now stands violently insisting that her recent allies make good their solemn promises to her, promises which she has been compelled already to reduce to an almost unrecognizable shape.

"But if Britain and France concede all that the President demands, if they agree to use their force to compel Italy to yield an impossible concession, they have still not the smallest assurance that the United States will accept the treaty of Versailles or the treaty of insurance. Mr. Wilson has the power of the executive branch of the American Government to use against them if he chooses, but he has not power over the legislative. Meantime the Jugo-Slavs are so encouraged by the President that they may resist any new Italian aggression, and such aggression becomes daily more likely.

"Moreover, for the British the situation becomes more acute, for it is clear that the popular sentiment in France is growing more and more favorable to a recognition of the probability that America will not accept European responsibilities and more and more insistent that, as a consequence, Europe must proceed to settle her own questions. This means that the British, French, and Italians must form an out-and-out alliance and thus united enforce their several demands, the French at the Rhine, the Italians along the Adriatic, and all three in Asia Minor. The British have not the smallest desire for a new European alliance. They desire the closest sort of Anglo-American association, an alliance if possible. They will not follow France or Italy in resisting the President, yet they have made promises to both, and their situation will be extremely awkward if, under American pressure, they break their engagements to the Continent, only to find that this sacrifice has not contributed in the least to increasing American willingness to enter European affairs or to make an Anglo-American alliance.

SOLUTION BASED ON FORCE.

"Of course, if Europe were satisfied that America was done with its affairs Europe would seek its own solution for pending questions. The solution would necessarily be based upon force. France, having renounced the occupation of the Rhine barrier in deference to President Wilson's objection and in return for his promised guaranty, would reassert her claims to the barrier security, basing these claims upon the nonfulfillment by America of the President's pledge. Nor could the British effectively oppose this.

"But in the same order of ideas Italy would retain Fiume and there would be a swift elimination of those portions of the several peace treaties which owe their existence to the President's Paris adventure. The several League of Nations areas would disappear. Danzig would go to the Poles, Fiume to the Italians, the Sarre to France. The lot of the Germans would necessarily become harder and the chances of any economic recovery even more slender.

"British policy still clings to the notion that America and Britain, in association, can not merely preserve the chief elements in the existing settlement, but also bring about a modification of certain of the treaty provisions which seem to insure permanent German ruin. But this policy, which demands great apparent sacrifices from the French and none from the British, can not prevail unless it is supported by America and enforced by American financial power.

CANCELLATION OF LOANS.

"The British conceive that if America is allowed to redraft the terms of the treaty of Versailles in such fashion as to save Germany economically, and the balance of Europe as well, it will agree to vast new loans and not impossibly to the cancellation of $10,000,000,000 of existing loans. They believe this because it falls in with what the President and those associated with him in Paris declared was the real character of American idealism. But they know all such amendments will encounter strenuous continental opposition and recognize that only American power and prestige can put them through.

"Nevertheless, as long as there is the remotest chance of an American return to Europe, Great Britain will not run the smallest risk either of offending the President or of raising an impassable barrier between Britain and the President's opponents in America. The course of Lord Grey demonstrated the latter. The course of Lloyd-George in his reply to President Wilson demonstrated the former. Great Britain wants American association, but is indifferent as to whether it comes through the President or through his political antagonists.

"Inevitably a policy based upon the pursuit of American cooperation involves ever-increasing British estrangement with the French, with the Italians, with the Continent. What is not clear is whether it can in the end lead to any compensatingly closer Anglo-American relations. The difficulty here lies in the paralysis of American machinery. The President can not do anything affirmatively; his opponents will do nothing through the existing medium, namely, the League of Nations, while the protraction of the dispute over this is having for an unmistakable effect an expansion of American sentiment in favor of avoiding all European entanglements, continental and British.

COLONIES DISSATISFIED.

"Nor is it less worthy of note that the British desire to make every concession to America has once more involved the United Kingdom in a dispute with a colony. All through the Paris conference the deference shown by the British delegation to the President aroused the protest of Australia through its prime minister, Hughes, an outspoken critic of the President. Now, Viscount Grey's suggestion to increase the United States voting power in the League of Nations to counterbalance the votes conceded to British colonies has stirred Canadian dissatisfaction.

"Indeed, it is almost impossible to make a census of the number of mix-ups which have followed our first European adventure. Britain and her colonies have disagreed; Britain and France are at loggerheads; so are Britain and Italy. France and Italy have almost come to blows; France and Roumania are mutually resentful. Our insistence upon Serb claims in the Banat has compelled Britain and France to break their word to Roumania; it has led to a Serbo-Roumanian feud. With no real power to resist and without any assurance of aid from us, the Jugo-Slavs are holding out against the demands of Italy, which have been supported until recently by France and Britain. We have refused Greece her aspirations in Thrace and about Koritza; our ultimate decision in Asia Minor, where settlements have also been outlined without regard to us, may precipitate another Fiume crisis. Or the President may reject the proposal to leave the Turk in Constantinople.

"Obviously, if Europe could determine what American policy was to be for the future the situation would be different. But ever since the Paris conference, ever since the President came home, Europe has had to operate on two mutually exclusive assumptions—the assumption that the President's ideas would be adopted by the United States and the assumption that they would be rejected. If President Wilson's ideas were destined to prevail, Europe would reluctantly make the necessary concessions, but they would have to be paid for by American loans and American pledges of military and naval support. But if the President's ideas were destined to fail, then Europe would have to settle its own problems in its own way.

UNITED STATES MONEY NECESSARY?

"To-day, yesterday, to-morrow, as far as it is possible to see, neither course can be followed and chaos persists as a result. In the case of Fiume, it seems to me that the President is dead right on the merits of the case. The Italian demands are preposterous; they quarrel with every consideration of moral right. But the Jugo-Slav case, just as it is, fortified as it is by all regard for principle, is still untenable if there be not force behind it, and that force can come only from the use of American money and perhaps arms.

"The moment the Italians are satisfied that we shall do nothing they will declare their purpose to stay where they are, and then who can put them out? Certainly the French will not even think of it; rather they will feel compelled to assent, because American decision to stay out of Europe reopens for them the old danger of an attack on the Alps and the Rhine. As for the British, they may protest, but they certainly will not go beyond this. What, then, will be the position of the Slavs, resentful but helpless, and threatened henceforth on all sides? Threatened because of American policy in the Banat as well as along the Adriatic.

"But if the situation continues unsettled Italy may be faced with a domestic political crisis. She can not demobilize. Her army is costing her terribly. Her own Government may sink as a result of the two pressures—that coming from the nationalists and that coming from the socialists. The Jugo-Slavs are no better off, while the repercussions are felt all through Europe.

"It will be perceived, then, how little of the real Fiume question is actually comprehended in a discussion of the case of the city itself and how symptomatic it is of the whole European network of problems.

THE PROMISED REWARDS.

"Fundamentally the situation turns upon a fact which has only now begun to be appreciated in the United States. President Wilson believed, when he went to Europe, that he had only to insist upon the 14 points and he would be supported by the mass of the people of all nations. Having thus established peace on this basis, he assumed that it would automatically endure as a 'peace of justice.'

"In Europe he discovered that during the war nations involved had been compelled to make agreements, to promise Japan, Italy, and Roumania certain rewards for participation. Promised these rewards, Japan, Italy, and Roumania had entered the war to the very great profit of France and Britain, who otherwise would have been defeated. These agreements, the famous 'secret treaties,' manifestly conflicted with the 14 points, but neither France nor Britain could safely go back on these agreements if the nations that held their pledges insisted upon performance. In the case of Japan President Wilson agreed in the end to yield, and with informal promises of Shantung evacuation Japan acquired what had been promised her.

"In the case of Italy the President refused to yield, and the Italians insisted upon performance. Britain and France were thus called upon to decide whether their pledge to Italy was a 'scrap of paper' or their decision to follow Mr. Wilson necessarily abolished. For many months, for a whole year, British and French statesmen have been temporizing, seeking to 'keep in' with Wilson while not actually breaking with Italy. Meantime the French have more and more inclined to stand with the Italians and the British with Wilson.

ISSUE UNCHANGED.

"To-day the issue remains unchanged. Italy demands the performance of solemn pledges embodied in the treaty of London, and points to the fact that one of the great issues of the war was the maintenance of the sanctity of international obligations. Britain and France, having tried to arrive at a compromise and having merely aroused the President's indignation, are still faced with the dilemma. The gravity of the problem lies in the fact that even complete acceptance of the President's leadership and the consequent alienation of Italy may not insure American support for the future, while yielding to Italy and estranging the President may lead to the loss of all chance of American assistance or American participation. All of which is another way of saying that Europe, in the hope of enlisting American aid in European reconstruction and peace maintenance, has placed in the President's hands absolute veto power, so far as its own policies are concerned, only to discover that it has not acquired any assurance of American participation. Now, the French and the Italians, like the Roumanians and the Greeks, desire to regain freedom of action and take away the President's power of veto, while Great Britain still insists upon placating the President, because British statesmen still cling to the idea that America, if not disgusted, will presently come back into European affairs.

"This means, if it means anything, that the Continent, France, Italy, and the smaller States will at no distant time repudiate the President's control of European affairs, while British opposition to such a repudiation will lead to a complete break between Britain and the Continent. Then the question will arise whether the United States will reward the British course by participation in an Anglo-American alliance. If it does, British policy at Paris and since will be vindicated; if it does not, that policy will prove a very costly blunder. But every recent indication from London serves to confirm the Paris impression that the British mean to run every risk in the hope of realizing the Anglo-American alliance."

THE FIUME INCIDENT.

Mr. KNOX. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial published in this morning's Philadelphia North American on the Fiume incident. It shows how sweet it is for brethren to dwell together in peace and harmony.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia North American, Mar. 1, 1920.]

A COSTLY VICTORY.

"Publication of the correspondence on the Adriatic question shows conclusively that illness has not impaired in any degree President Wilson's powers as a writer and a controversialist. His countrymen should, however, make the most of whatever comfort this circumstance affords, since it is the only aspect of the international situation which gives grounds for such a feeling. As was foreseen, the President has won another diplomatic victory; but, as in many like cases, it has been achieved at the expense of Europe and the United States. Settlement of one of the most dangerous problems arising from the war has been indefinitely deferred; strife-breeding suspicions and rivalries have been intensified without providing a means of allaying them; and, finally, increased hostility toward America has been bred among the allied nations, which are incensed and utterly bewildered to find that a Government which will not cooperate with them asserts a right of veto and dictation.

"The outstanding feature of the correspondence, indeed, is a tone of bitterness such as is seldom discernible in diplomatic communications between friendly nations, not to speak of associates in a common cause. It is a depressing commentary upon the 'new world order,' to which such ostentatious deference is paid, to find that there is more acerbity, a keener spirit of discontent and accusation, in the messages that passed between President Wilson and the allied premiers than ever marked the notes he exchanged with the government of the Kaiser five years ago. There is left hardly a pretense of harmony, and such desire for cooperation as remains is plainly inspired by considerations of expediency or of need rather than of genuine sympathy and confidence. On one side is manifested the anger of offended arrogance; on the other, a disdain for methods regarded as uncouth, with its expression restrained, however, by fear of vengeful reprisals.

"The record to be examined really begins with the joint Anglo-French American memorandum of December 9 proposing an inclusive settlement of the controversies between Italy and Jugo-Slavia, and the plan of January 14, wherein Great Britain, France, and Italy agreed upon modified terms, the compromise not being submitted in advance to the United States. Most Americans are familiar with the outlines of these two documents, which we discussed in detail last week.

"Sharp inquiry as to the procedure having been made from Washington, the British and French premiers explained on January 23 that the second proposal was 'the best available reconciliation of the Italian and Jugo-Slav points of view'; reminding the President that 'he had not heard the arguments and could not interview the principals concerned,' they intimated that he might concede to them a desire to reach the fairest possible decision. To one of Mr. Wilson's temperament such suggestions were intolerable, and he turned immediately from small-arm fire to heavy artillery, laying down a devastating barrage of reproaches, accusations, and ultimatums.

"His note of Februry 10 was unusually effective, not because of any innovations in the attack but because his opponents had supplied him with his most destructive ammunition. In the proposal of December Great Britain and France had joined the United States in explicitly rejecting and reprobating Italian demands which the two former indorsed in the modified plan of January. President Wilson did not fail to turn their own words against them. 'The President,' he wrote, 'can not believe that a settlement containing provisions which have already received the well-merited condemnation of the French and British Governments can be regarded as right,' and thereupon he cited the reversals of judgment.

"While the Allies had protested that only two features of the original plan had been changed, and these to the advantage of Jugo-Slavia, he retorted that it had been 'profoundly altered to the advantage of improper Italian objectives.' Against the granting to Italy of a narrow strip of coast near Fiume he quoted the December memorandum to the effect that this 'appears to run counter to every consideration of geography, economics, and territorial convenience,' and he recalled that 'unjust and inexpedient annexation' forbidden in December was approved in January. He also complained of the discarding of his idea of a 'free State of Fiume,' comprising the city and surrounding territory, and the creation of Fiume as an independent city under the League of Nations, 'with the right to choose its own diplomatic representatives.' Fiume being Italian, such representatives would be of that race, and Mr. Wilson held that the plan 'paves the way for future annexation.'

"It was not upon facts or arguments, however, that he relied to give force to his demand for cancellation of the January proposal, but upon undisguised coercion. When this feature of his note was made known in Paris 'emphatic denial was made at the White House,' according to an inspired dispatch, and officials characterized this interpretation as 'an absolute falsehood.' Yet the text when published showed that the President had made these deliberate threats:

"The Adriatic issue raises the fundamental question as to whether the American Government can on any terms cooperate with its European associates in maintaining the peace of the world. If substantial agreement on what is just and reasonable is not to determine international issues * * * then the time is not yet come when this Government can enter a concert of powers. * * * If it does not appear feasible to secure acceptance of the memorandum of December 9, he must take under serious consideration the withdrawal of the treaty with Germany and the agreement between the United States and France.

"Stripped of diplomatic cant, President Wilson's decree was that unless his view prevailed he would kill both the peace treaty, with the league covenant, and the special treaty guaranteeing support to France in case of attack. Threatened with such dire consequences, the Allies were compelled to seek conciliation, but they could not wholly conceal their resentment nor deal gently with Mr. Wilson's errors of statement and deduction. They did not find it 'altogether easy to understand' his position and declared that there was 'no foundation for the assumption' that they had adopted the Italian view. The 'free State of Fiume,' his great contribution to the settlement, was an idea rejected by both Italy and Jugo-Slavia. Furthermore, the Allies' plan, while transferring 50,000 Jugo-Slavs to Italian sovereignty, restored 200,000 of them to their own fatherland, while Mr. Wilson's map drawing had allotted 400,000 to Italy. Reminding the President that he had withdrawn his representative from the conference and 'could not therefore be in close touch with the changes of opinion and circumstances,' the premiers asked, politely but firmly, 'How does the United States Government propose that this dispute should ever be closed?'

"In studied rebuke they inquired whether Mr. Wilson actually considered that this country 'should withdraw from the comity of nations because it does not agree with the precise terms of the Adriatic settlement'? And they expressed the hope that the United States 'will not wreck the whole machinery for dealing with international disputes because its view is not adopted in this particular case.' They 'could not believe' the American people would 'take a step so far-reaching and terrible on a ground which has the appearance of being so inadequate.'

"They were to be instructed again, of course, that such decisions are made not by the American people but by President Wilson. His second note told them he had 'no choice but to maintain the position he has all along taken.' Otherwise, it was but an extension of his former arguments. He offered, however, one definite concession:

"The President would, of course, make no objection to a settlement mutually agreeable to Italy and Jugo-Slavia regarding their common frontier in the Fiume region, providing that such agreement is not made on the basis of compensations elsewhere at the expense of nationals of a third power.

"In their reply the allied premiers have seized upon this suggestion and have proposed a withdrawal of both the December and January plans, so that the contending nations may try to reach an agreement by negotiation.

"Few Americans will feel competent to adopt offhand judgment upon this complicated problem, but thoughtful students of the correspondence will find in it the most disquieting implications. They will reject, for example, President Wilson's repeated assertion that his Adriatic settlement alone harmonizes with 'the principles for which America entered the war.' By the decision of her people and the explicit terms of her declaration, America entered the war to defeat Germany, to preserve human liberty against the designs of an imperialistic autocracy, to protect American lives from attack and American property from spoliation; she never had the remotest idea of entering the war in order to vitiate a treaty made among the Allies, or to prevent the development of Italy, or to draw boundaries for the Balkan races.

"Despite this fact, the President undertakes to make America responsible for those aims, and to enforce their fulfillment upon Europe by uttering threats in the name of the American people. Reckless of the country's refusal to accept the obligations to which he audaciously pledged it, he still assumes the voice of one whose decrees are law, and menaces friendly nations with a withdrawal of that which he had no power to guarantee. Hardly less provocative is his hardy insistence that he alone strives for 'equity and right,' while all who question his mandates are selfish intriguers. His intellectual arrogance is not even relieved by a saving grace of humor, for he proclaims that 'no Government or group of Governments has the right to dispose of the territory or to determine the political allegiance of any free people,' and then, having delivered a whole Province of China to Japan, he forbids Italy to possess the Italian city of Fiume and decrees its annexation to a Slav State.

"The one serious plea offered by and for President Wilson is that his course is designed to prevent future strife. He can not, he says, 'sacrifice principles to purchase a temporary appearance of calm in the Adriatic at the price of a future world conflagration.' This would be more convincing if there were any evidence that Mr. Wilson's judgment upon matters of peace and war is sound. It took him two years and a half to discover what the struggle in Europe was about, and his ideas of the proper procedure in peacemaking have brought the world to the verge of a new catastrophe. Does this record argue that he has knowledge superior to the statesmen of Europe respecting a problem so complex as that of the Adriatic? Is it perfectly clear that it were better to obstruct every settlement short of absolute justice—which is utterly unattainable—than to seek a reasonable compromise which would satisfy at least the urgent demand for peace?

"But the most serious aspect of the affair is that, even if the President's course were miraculously designed to solve the Adriatic difficulty, its larger effects would disastrously outweigh that assumed achievement. For he has not only immeasurably strengthened the enmity between Italy and Jugo-Slavia, whatever the ultimate settlement may be, but he has embittered the Italian people against the United States and has destroyed the sense of confidence and cooperation between the Allies and America which was the one hope of making an enduring peace in the world."

WHEAT POOL.

Mr. FERNALD. I ask to have read an article in the Washington Post this morning, on page 11, entitled "Find big wheat pool."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERNALD. As soon as the article has been read I wish to make a few comments upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

FIND BIG WHEAT POOL—UNITED STATES JURY CHARGES GRAIN OFFICIALS PROFITED BY MANIPULATION—OWN 85 PER CENT, IT IS SAID—REPORT SAYS GOVERNMENT CONTROLLERS CAUSED RISE IN PRICE FROM $2.22 TO $3.30 FOR HARD WHEAT—A. M. HOUSER "REAL PARTY IN INTEREST," IT IS SAID.

"SPOKANE, WASH., February 29.

"The Federal grand jury has made a report, in which it expresses belief that the credit of the United States Government has been used by wheat speculators to carry the great bulk of the 1919 wheat crop. It states that it is within the power of the Government to reduce the price of flour whenever it chooses and begs such relief.

"The names of high officials of the United States Grain Corporation, organized by the Government to protect its citizens, are mentioned in the report. It follows:

"'When the Government appropriated $1,000,000,000 to buy the 1919 wheat crop, wheat receipts became as good as Government bonds. Banks were glad to loan money in any quantity to purchase wheat, for the money paid the farmers was immediately redeposited in the banks.

'HELD 85 PER CENT, IT IS CHARGED.

"'The minimum price of wheat was fixed in the Northwest at $2.20 for soft wheat and $2.22 for hard wheat, coast points, and the prices paid the farmers were these sums less freight to coast points, averaging about 13 cents per bushel, and certain other charges which amounted to from 4 to 6 cents per bushel. In some cases a small premium was paid for hard wheat.

"'The majority of the mills in the Northwest are owned by a half dozen concerns, and each in turn has a grain company, which is officered and operated by the men who own the milling concerns.

"'From a great mass of testimony presented before the grand jury we believe that 85 per cent of the 1919 wheat crop of this State, estimated at 42,000,000 bushels, went into the hands of these half dozen grain companies and was purchased prior to October 15, before any material advance in price.

'BANKS HONEYCOMBED WITH RECEIPTS.

"'The banks of this State are honeycombed with warehouse receipts; Spokane banks at one time were carrying $9,000,000 worth of warehouse receipts, and it is not unusual to find that a small country bank has loaned $1,000,000 on wheat receipts.

"'Having bought practically all of the wheat in the States of Oregon and Washington, these grain companies have been able to advance the price by sales to each other and through manipulations of the grain market centered at Indianapolis and by other methods.

"'Although the greater part of the wheat was purchased around $2.07, the grain companies are selling the wheat to their own milling concerns at the prevailing market price, which at present is from $3 to $3.30 per bushel for hard wheat. Their own mills are asserting the rights to manufacture flour on the basis of the price paid for the wheat—a price which is the result of their own acts of manipulation.

"'The by-products of flour, bran and shorts, are a necessary food for dairy cattle, and the prices now demanded by these by-products mean destruction of the dairy industry.

"'Under regulations existing in 1918 millers were prohibited from making more than 50 cents a ton on mill feeds, and a "fair" price on carload lots was fixed by the United States Food Administrator at $28.75 per ton, while to-day mill feeds are selling on the Spokane Exchange at $43 per ton, carload lots, and $50 at coast points.

"'The Pacific Grain Co., the successor of the M. H. Houser Grain Co., the Pacific Coast Elevator Co., and the Puget Sound Warehouse & Elevator Co. are owned and operated in connection with the Portland flour mills concern, with headquarters at Portland, Oreg.

"'These corporations were owned by M. H. Houser, vice president of the United States Grain Corporation for the northwestern district. At the time he became vice president he made some kind of a transfer of his interests in these concerns and does not at this time appear as the owner.

'SAY HOUSER IS "REAL PARTY."

"'The officers of the United States Grain Corporation for the northwestern district and the offices of the above named being quartered in a building owned by M. H. Houser, in Portland, Oreg., it is, by reason thereof, the belief of the grand jurors that Houser is the real party in interest in the milling and grain concerns above named, and that by reason of his connection with the United States Grain Corporation he has been able to manipulate and operate them to an immense profit to himself and associates.

"'The Pacific Grain Co. admits having bought 11,000,000 bushels of the 1919 wheat crop.

"'It is impossible for this district to obtain relief, for the grain companies threaten in case action is taken to force them to sell the grain to the mills at the price paid by them plus a reasonable carrying charge to close the mills and ship the grain to eastern points.

"'To frustrate any concerted plan of evasion we would urge that the Department of Justice take simultaneous action in all wheat and flour centers of the United States.

'GLASS URGED BIG APPROPRIATION.

"'According to press reports, former Secretary of the Treasury GLASS recommended to Congress the appropriation of $150,000,000 to purchase flour and wheat. It is our belief that this wheat is now owned largely by speculators, and in some cases by interests directly and indirectly connected with some of the officers of the United States Grain Corporation. Sales to Europe will benefit only the purse of individuals and the consumer will pay the bills.

"'We would recommend that a proclamation be issued fixing a selling price of all wheat now held in the United States at the price paid the farmers, plus a reasonable carrying charge, said fixed price not to apply to the producer, and that similar price be fixed on flour and mill feeds.

"'We further recommend that no appropriation be made by Congress to finance the sales of wheat, flour, or mill products to foreign countries until such time in which the American people are relieved from paying the extortionate prices now required of them by reason of the grain manipulation as herein stated.'

"The report is signed by L. Roy Slater, foreman, and George W. Fuller, secretary."

Mr. FERNALD. I also ask to have printed an article on the same subject from the New York American of this date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the New York American, Mar. 1, 1920.]

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY MILLION DOLLAR WHEAT CONSPIRACY CHARGED—BREAD BOOSTED 50 PER CENT—UNITED STATES OFFICIALS NAMED—GRAND JURY'S FINDINGS ARE PIGEONHOLED IN WASHINGTON—M. H. HOUSER, MILL OWNER AND A FORMER FOOD OFFICIAL, ACCUSED OF MAKING HUGE WHEAT CORNER—HOOVER FOOD PLAN INVOLVED—SPECULATORS FACING RUIN UNLESS GOVERNMENT APPROPRIATES HUGE SUM TO TAKE THEIR GRAIN.

"WASHINGTON, February 29.

"The report formulated by the Federal grand jury at Spokane, Wash., involving the United States Grain Corporation in an alleged 'billion-dollar manipulation' by wheat speculators, and affecting directly every bread consumer in the Nation, was received by the Department of Justice about the middle of February.

"The report, amazing in detail and striking to the heart of an alleged system of secret 'jockeying' of the bread market, was made February 7. It was pigeonholed by the Department of Justice.

"Responding to the urgings of M. H. Houser, one of the vice presidents of the United States Grain Corporation, and who is accused virtually of having profiteered in the sale of wheat while holding a Government office, and the strong recommendation by Julius H. Barnes, head of the Grain Corporation, the Department of Justice later 'got busy.'

"Although the department had shelved the recommendations of the Spokane grand jury for a blanket investigation, it now appears ready to conduct an inquiry on the pleas of Houser and Barnes. This inquiry, being conducted at Portland, Oreg., appears to be an investigation of the grand jury which had urged an investigation of the alleged manipulations in wheat.

HOOVER'S PLAN INVOLVED.

"Involved in the case, as pointed out in the presentment, is the propaganda of Barnes and Herbert Hoover as appearing in their newly acquired newspaper in Washington to 'boost' the plan to finance wheat and flour to foreign countries on a large scale.

"The Hoover-Barnes propaganda and the 'rush' with which Barnes and Houser stirred up the 'investigation' of the grand jury is interpreted by men of high office to mean that the 'handwriting on the wall' has been seen and feared.

"It is maintained that the Nation-wide scheme alleged will not be realized unless the speculators are successful in inducing Congress to use $150,000,000 of the appropriation to take the wheat which they have cornered off their hands.

"It is the above appropriation that Hoover and Barnes are urging in their newspaper.

"Faced by the coming expiration of the Government's minimum price guaranty and the probable subsequent recall by the banks of the millions which they have loaned on warehouse receipts, it is claimed these speculators now see ruin impending unless they can get rid of their holdings prior to the harvesting of the 1920 crop.

OFFICIALS ARE ACCUSED.

"It is in this speculation, deep down, that some of the officials of the United States Grain Corporation are involved, according to the Federal grand jury's charges.

"The grand jury intimated strongly that the motive which prompted the grand jury to investigate the conditions prevailing in the wheat market was to make public the machinations of the grain ring and to prevent them from using the United States Treasury or its credit, and further as a shield from the unexpected results of their alleged manipulations.

"In the opinion of the grand jury, the situation which they discovered in Spokane and its vicinity exists on a similar scale throughout the wheat-growing districts of the United States. Instead of launching the systematic investigation urged by the grand jury to protect the rights of consumers, the only action even contemplated by the Department of Justice appears to be the investigation of the grand jury which had made the report.

"It is regarded as significant that when the substance of the presentment was first made known in official channels that Houser wired Attorney General Palmer for a 'complete investigation.' It is also understood from an excellent source that Julius H. Barnes also requested an investigation.

"Mr. Barnes's contention, it was said, was that a grave charge had been made against a man connected with the Grain Corporation and that another inquiry was necessary to determine whether the charge were true. If it were true, Mr. Barnes is reported to have told the Attorney General, Mr. Houser should be indicted.

"The Attorney General ordered the Portland investigation, but not on the strength of the presentment which had urged immediate action, and which was pigeonholed, but after Houser and Barnes had acted.

JURY IS IGNORED.

"Not only did the Department of Justice fail to act on the grand jury's request, but officials of that bureau refuse to explain the 'why' of the pigeonholing episode.

"While denying the charges made by the Federal grand jury as being 'a damnable attempt to besmirch my integrity, prompted by political motives and motives of jealousy,' at Portland last night, M. H. Houser admitted his connection with the Pacific Grain Co. as stated in the presentment.

"Mr. Houser stated that he retained complete control of the grain organization he had built up before the war and that two years ago he had bought the entire chain of Theodore E. Wilcox properties, which include the Portland Flouring Mills and the Tacoma Warehouse Co. He controls in all 9 mills and 148 warehouses and elevators.

"United States Attorney Francis Garrecht, who conducted the investigation of the grand jury, said to-day, according to advices from Spokane:

"Houser's statement, to say the least, is neither clear nor convincing. People who know Mr. Houser best will be inclined to doubt his assertion that he was losing hundreds of dollars a day on the flour that he was milling. His insinuation that there was any ulterior motive or purpose on the part of the grand jury or the Department of Justice is absolutely without any foundation in fact.

"The farmer organizations to which he alludes as being opposed to Hoover and consequently inimical to himself were not known to exist by this grand jury.

"Probing deep into the affairs of the Houser concern, the grand jury found that Houser had bought up 11,000,000 bushels of the wheat crop.

"From an excellent source it became known to-day in a dispatch from Spokane that the abnormally high price of mill feed, rather than the sudden rise in wheat, was the original incentive to the grand-jury investigation.

DAIRYMEN FORCED OUT.

"Until the armistice in November, 1918, the United States Food Administration, controlling the mill-feed situation, kept the price of feed at $28.75 per ton. But when this control was withdrawn the mills at once raised the price to more than $40 a ton.

"As a result, many of the dairymen in the Spokane district were compelled to sell their cows and abandon business. The situation was growing acute when, in the fall of 1919, Julius H. Barnes, president of the Grain Corporation, was asked by numerous dairymen for relief. Barnes is reported as having stated that the Grain Corporation could do nothing to control the price of mill feed.

"District Attorney Humphreys, at Portland, who is in charge of the 'new investigation,' said:

"These charges against Houser are of a most serious nature, amounting to an allegation that he has profiteered in the sale of wheat while holding a Government office

"Senator GRONNA, of North Dakota, was one of the Members of the Senate to express wonder as to why the Attorney General had not taken action on the report of the first grand jury, as was Senator CAPPER, Republican, of Kansas."

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, for several months the Senate and the House of Representatives have been undertaking to lower the price of foodstuffs. We have investigated very many private concerns all over the country. I do not know a thing about this matter other than is stated in the article in the morning Post, except that I know in banking circles all over the country for the past six months it has been generally known that the banks in the Northwest were filled with wheat receipts and that many of the small banks have loaned out as much as a million dollars, country banks which naturally would not lend any one line of business more than three or four hundred thousand dollars. If this be true—and I am going to suggest that the matter be taken up by the Agricultural Committee—there ought to be an investigation of the subject.

We do know that for months the Federal Trade Commission have investigated all kinds of private business and have attempted to bring business men before the bar of public justice for the very small amounts which they have shown that those men have made in connection with the sale of different food products, and while the newspapers of the country have been filled with reports concerning the investigation of the five great meat packers, this Government organization has been making more than a dollar a bushel on every bushel of wheat that has been raised in some of the Western States.

The price which was fixed by the Government of $2.20 per bushel for wheat has gone to $3.20 per bushel. We have known that somebody was making money in the transaction. If this be true, every one of the men who have been associated in this matter ought to be indicted for grand and petit larceny. It is the most deplorable condition that has ever been brought to the attention of the people of the country, and the Senate of the United States ought to begin an investigation of the matter to-day.

Mr. President, I have been so opposed to all Government control of activities and to the different agencies which have been instituted to bring about such control that when I read an article of that kind I have hardly the patience to give it fair consideration or discussion. Every effort the Government has made to operate private business has resulted in failure. We have learned from the reports of the Railroad Administration and from the investigations of the Interstate Commerce Committee running over a period of several months that the Government has been operating the railroads at a loss of hundreds of millions of dollars; but, Mr. President, that does not begin to compare with the loss to the railroads of the country. The railroads are in a deplorable condition. In my State one great system that has been in the habit of laying more than 40,000 ties each year has not laid a new tie in the last three years.

We know of the great shortage of cars which are required for the transportation of fuel and food products all over the country. There have been none of these cars repaired, and it will be found that every siding from here to the State of Maine and from here to the Northwest is filled with cars that need some little repairs.

We have before us another committee proposition relative to operating the ships of the country, and an appropriation of $75,000,000 has been asked for the repair of a few ships in order that the Government may operate them; and yet every report as to every ship which has sailed out of our ports under Government control indicates that the operation has been conducted at a loss, although ocean freight rates have been advanced to an amount which is almost beyond the conception of the mind of man, at the expense, as my friend from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] demonstrated last week, of the American farmer. The situation has become such that food products can hardly be sold and shipped across the water by American farmers and merchants. Rates have been advanced from 200 to 400 per cent on such products, and yet we have the proposition to consider as to whether or not we shall continue the operation of ships.

The same condition exists as to the Fuel Administration; and I might go through other Government activities and demonstrate that a similar situation prevails. Only last Saturday I took up a newspaper, and I read that there are 39 different bureaus and 9 departments doing precisely the same thing, making 48 bureaus and departments that were operating and asking the same questions of the business men of the country.

All I wish to do is to submit this matter to the Agricultural Committee and ask that it be investigated. From now on let us see to it that every one of the Government agencies that are so active in interference and in the embarrassment of business shall be abolished and that business men have an opportunity to carry on their business in their own and a businesslike way so long as it is legitimate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. PHELAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. FERNALD. I will yield in just a few moments. I shall soon be through. If it be true that the officials in the United States Grain Corporation have been speculating, as this article suggests, I repeat that they ought to be indicted for grand larceny and sent to State prison.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The article presented by the Senator from Maine carries with it a very strong imputation of personal and official misconduct. It purports to be the finding of a grand jury, if I have been able to understand the language of the article as read. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine if the grand jury was charged with the investigation of such subjects?

Mr. FERNALD. That is precisely what I want to know. I have only the information from the Washington Post. If it is true that the grand jury is making an investigation, that would be sufficient; but I thought the Agricultural Committee could make such inquiries as might be necessary.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I also observed from the reading of the article that it recommended that the Attorney General take some steps regarding the matter. That was an indication to my mind that the grand jury itself had no jurisdiction, and, therefore, that it was acting wholly outside of any duty imposed by law. Does the Senator from Maine so understand?

Mr. FERNALD. I think so, I will say to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, if that be true, we have here an article which purports to come from a grand jury which went outside of its jurisdiction to take up a subject about which it had made no examination; and it would seem from the reading of the article that the grand jury made this report, in whatever form it may be, upon mere rumor. Does not the Senator from Maine so understand?

Mr. FERNALD. I understand that the facts of the article are correct. Just what the legal status of the case is, I do not know, not being a lawyer; but I know that the price of wheat is very much higher than it ought to be, and that it costs every man who purchases a barrel of flour to-day at least $4.50 more than it should.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think I can, perhaps, throw a little light upon the matter. My information is—and I derived it not only from the article which has been read but from a number of other articles which I have read—that an investigation was made by the State grand jury of a number of matters which came before its attention. It also made an investigation respecting the high price of commodities within the State, and reached the conclusion that no State law was infracted by the action of the individuals and corporations and organizations referred to; but it also reached the conclusion—that is the information I have received—that this matter came within the denouncement of the Federal statute—the Sherman antitrust law—and recommended proceedings under the Federal statute.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. LODGE rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield; and if so, to whom, as there are three Senators on the floor?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a unanimous-consent agreement printed upon the calendar this morning under which we are exceedingly anxious to bring up the Military Academy appropriation bill. I am therefore constrained to ask for the regular order.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I merely desire to say, if the Senator will allow me just a word——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have raised the question of the regular order.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the Senator from New York calls for the regular order, he has a right to do so, but I should like to state——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York demands the regular order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the discussion does not go to any great length I shall not object, but I simply have the interest of legislation at heart; that is all.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will wait until the regular order is laid before the Senate.

Mr. FERNALD. I wish to say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. FERNALD. Just a moment, Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Let us have the regular order, Mr. President. The understanding was that the Military Academy appropriation bill should be taken up at the earliest possible moment. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no reports of committees, bills and joint resolutions are in order.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 3996) to authorize the sale or lease of real estate or any interest therein, acquired for the use of the Army since April 6, 1917, and no longer needed therefor; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SMITH of Georgia:

A bill (S. 3997) for the relief of D. Beatrice Arline; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 3998) authorizing any tribes or bands of Indians of California to submit claims to the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 166) to permit the payment of certain money for the acquisition of land for the United States Army General Hospital No. 19, Azalea, N. C; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for investigations in operation of seed and plant introduction, etc., from $82,700 to $114,200, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to grant authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to accept lands for field stations, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

AMNESTY TO PRISONERS (S. DOC. NO. 241).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Acting Secretary of State replying to the resolution of the Senate dated January 13, 1920, requesting that it be furnished with information showing what, if anything, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium, or either of these Governments, have done, through legislative or executive proclamation, or otherwise, looking to the granting of amnesty to military, political, or other prisoners since the signing of the armistice November 11, 1918.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
27 February, 1920.

SHIP AND RAIL TERMINAL ON SAN DIEGO BAY.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution of the common council of the city of San Diego, Calif., making a proposition to the Federal Government for terminal shipping and rail facilities on San Diego Bay.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution of the common council of the city of San Diego, Calif. (Res. No. 25266), approving the proposed establishment of a Federal ship and rail terminal on San Diego Bay, at such point and under such policy as Congress may prescribe, as a means of furthering overseas commerce.

"Whereas the city of National City, located on San Diego Bay, has by resolution of the city trustees, the legislative body of said city, of the date of December 18, 1917, tendered to the Federal Government without cost tidelands bordering upon the channel waters of San Diego Bay for the establishment of a Federal ship and rail terminal in the interests of commerce and navigation; and

"Whereas the city of San Francisco, the 'premier port' of the Pacific, has by resolution of the board of supervisors, the legislative body of said city, of the date of December 30, 1917, ceded to the Federal Government all tidelands standing in the name of the city, together with all streets and street ends, without cost of any kind, for the purpose of establishing a Federal ship and rail terminal as a means of promoting the interests of commerce and navigation, in accordance with the existing and contemplated policy of furthering overseas trade; and

"Whereas at a public hearing before the United States Senate Committee on Commerce held in Washington on February 4, 1920, Gen. William B. Black, former Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, now serving as engineer adviser for the National Shipping Board, controlling and operating Government merchant ships of the value of $2,000,000,000, recommended the construction and operation of a modern Federal ship and rail terminal at Bayonne, N. J., in order to relieve the congestion and escape the extortionate rates charged for berth space in the port of New York, an increase from the prewar price of from $60 to $80 per day, as stated by Gen. William Black, to $250 and $666, thereby imposing undue burdens upon the sea commerce of the Nation at a time when overseas trade is in the balance, demanding the highest efficiency in ship and seaboard rail movement; and

"Whereas the city of San Diego, State of California, was the first municipality in the United States to anticipate naval needs of the Nation by the cession of 500 acres of tidelands without cost for the establishment of a naval base, upon which the Secretary of the Navy has recommended the expenditure of $30,000,000 in the form of sea walls, channel dredging, ship-repair yards, marine ways, and other aids to navigation in keeping with the national policy of naval expansion; and

"Whereas the physical conditions of San Diego Bay are such that provision for the channel and general port needs of the Navy in the form of increased channel area will furnish the basic needs of the nationally owned merchant ships by a single outlay, with the exception of modern docks and rail terminals: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the common council, the legislative body of the city of San Diego, State of California, as trustee of all the tidelands bordering upon San Diego Bay within its corporate limits, That it views with favor the establishment and operation of Federal ship and rail terminals, as advocated by Gen. William M. Black, engineer adviser of the National Shipping Board, and hereby pledges its support and assistance in every way possible to the accomplishment of that object as an aid to overseas commerce and national trade expansion; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the National Shipping Board, the United States Railroad Administration, and to the Federal Representatives of the State of California at Washington.

"Presented by Councilman Virgilio Bruschi.

"I hereby certify the above to be a full, true, and correct copy of resolution No. 25266 of the common council of the city of San Diego as adopted by said council February 11, 1920.

[SEAL.] "ALLEN H. WRIGHT, City Clerk."

THE ADRIATIC SITUATION.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD an article from the Sun and New York Herald of Saturday last on the Adriatic situation.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sun and New York Herald, Feb. 28, 1920.]

MR. WILSON'S ADRIATIC DISPUTE EXPOSES OUR DANGER FROM THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"Into his challenge of the decision of the Governments concerned in the Adriatic crisis Mr. Wilson has put all the brilliance and power of intellect which he gives to any cause that he makes peculiarly his own. His indictment of their methods and purposes is as shrewd a piece of mingled idealism and casuistry as his keen mind has ever contrived.

"The President, indeed, was never in truer Wilson form than when he threatened to kick the League of Nations into kingdom come because the proposed settlement of the Adriatic question was not to his liking. His disregard of the practicable, his pursuit of the unattainable, were never more complete. His insistence that a mutual understanding among several nations must always mean acceptance of his views was never more unqualified; his intolerance of a majority dissent from those views never more absolute.

"In the Adriatic matter, as Mr. Wilson sees it, as he expresses it, and as he decrees it, it is not a question of what is now possible. It is not a question of what Great Britain and France, bound by a treaty compact with Italy, now want and can agree upon. It is not a question of what Italy and Jugo-Slavia now want and can agree upon. It is not a question of what the different elements of the population of Fiume now want and can agree upon. It is a question of what Mr. Wilson wants them all to want, and what he is willing to permit them to agree upon.

"It unquestionably is a fact, as Mr. Wilson declares, that there is not perfect justice in the compromise settlement. The Allies themselves say so. Both Jugo-Slavia and Italy concur. But anybody except Mr. Wilson must concede that no settlement that could be worked out by mortal man would give perfect justice to everybody. Short of Heaven itself, there is no such thing as perfection of anything. When different interests are in conflict there can be no such thing as full satisfaction to all.

"Furthermore, what might be justice to all those nations concerned, in the opinion of Mr. Wilson, might, in their own opinion, be justice to none. The Allies, in truth, point out to the President that the proposed terms of settlement take away from Italy things and rights which Italy has believed and still believes are hers. In the same way Jugo-Slavia, while getting such surrendered things and rights, does not get and could not get others which her nationals claim as naturally belonging to them. But each is benefited. Both are more content:

"The origin of the proposal of January 20 lies in the fact that when the Prime Ministers of Great Britain and France came to deal directly both with the representatives of Italy and Jugo-Slavia in Paris they found that nobody desired the consummation of the free State of Fiume, which had always been an essential part of the American proposals for settlement. They discovered that Jugo-Slavia would prefer a settlement which did away with the free State, including, as it does, a population of 200,000 Slavs, and included as much as possible of its territory and population within its own borders. Accordingly the Governments of France and Great Britain, continuing the negotiations from the point at which they had been left on December 9, made the proposal under discussion, including the rectification of the Wilson line and the cessation to Italy of a strip of territory running along the shore so as to connect it with the free city of Fiume. The net upshot of which was that Jugo-Slavia was to gain, as compared with the American proposal, an additional 150,000 Jugo-Slavs, while agreeing to the inclusion within the Italian frontier of a further 50,000 Jugo-Slavs in addition to the 400,000 which President Wilson had already agreed to allot to that country.

"If Mr. Wilson himself were the sole arbiter of the points in dispute, if he were determining the questions in accordance with his principles of justice, he could not satisfy all the claimants, he might not satisfy a single one of the claimants. He might not satisfy a soul on earth but himself. Groping after the shadow of exaggerated idealism but rejecting the substance of practical compromise, he might wrong and inflame all. The only practical thing, as the joint notes of the Allies well say and as they quote Mr. Wilson himself as having once said, is to come as near as possible to giving general satisfaction:

"The difficulty of the task, the patience required in order to effect it successfully, the uselessness of endeavoring to enforce preconceived ideas on refractory material has been recognized by the one more clearly than the other, and in his address at the opening session of the peace conference he pointed out how impossible it was to expect imperfect human beings and imperfect nations to agree at once upon ideal solutions. He made it clear that in his judgment the only course before the peace conference was to do the best it could in the circumstances and to create machinery whereby improvements and rectifications could be effected by reason and common sense under the authority of the League of Nations instead of by resort to war.

"But perfect or imperfect justice in this Adriatic crisis, wise solution or unwise solution of this delicate, difficult, and dangerous problem, nothing could more strongly emphasize the pitfalls for everybody of this League of Nations, conceived out of the imagination of Mr. Wilson, than the President's action. Nothing could more vividly reveal its perils to the United States than the very argument, protest, and wrath of Mr. Wilson against this compromise decision.

"Here is the League of Nations—Mr. Wilson's own league, as he willed to impose it on our country—in existence and in operation. Here it is functioning in one of the crucial situations of the Old World. Here is the first great decision of members of Mr. Wilson's league in a question which affects the peace and safety of Europe. It is a decision acceptable to Europe in general and to those most directly concerned in particular. But straightway Mr. Wilson, creator of and sponsor for that very league, sets all Europe by the ears with his refusal to abide by the decision, although the United States is not even a member of the league.

"Suppose the United States were already in the league. Suppose Mr. Wilson, then acting for this Government instead of merely for himself as now, threatened to snatch our country out of the league because he did not like a decision reached by its members, except for him, unanimously. Suppose he threatened to cancel on the spot all the contracts we had made with the league, all the obligations we had assumed directly and indirectly with its members. Suppose he threatened to ride roughshod over the League of Nations to compel it to do his bidding. What an uproar this country and the world would be in because of our membership in his League of Nations! To what a danger of war he would have exposed us! Into what a welter of war he might actually have plunged us; and, as we say, through this very League of Nations—Mr. Wilson's own League of Nations—which he has been determined to jam down the throats of the American people."

RAILROAD WAGE CONTROVERSIES.

Mr. POMERENE. I have sent for a copy of the letter which was addressed by the President to the railroad organization representatives relative to the wage controversy. I do not have it before me, but it appeared in the Sunday morning papers, and is of such universal interest that I ask that it be incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GORE. I did not understand the request.

Mr. POMERENE. The request was that the letter written by the President to the different railroad organizations, bearing upon the subject of wage controversies, may be incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. GORE. I have no objection. I should like to ask that there also be printed in the RECORD the manifesto issued by the brotherhoods, I believe, or by organized labor, a few days ago, just before the passage of the bill. Whether Senators entirely approve of its arguments and conclusions, it seems to me that it ought to be in the RECORD. They have a right to state their side of the case in their own way, and those who wish to consider the whole case ought to have access to it.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection.

Mr. GORE. I was sure the Senator would not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WILSON'S LETTER TO HEADS OF RAIL UNIONS ON WAGE ISSUE.

President Wilson yesterday sent the following letter to the chiefs of the railroad labor unions who are negotiating for wage advances:

"THE WHITE HOUSE,
"Washington, 28 February, 1920.

"GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 14th instant and the subsequent arguments presented on your behalf with reference to the subject of pending claims for wage increases have had my careful consideration. The passage of the railroad bill by the House of Representatives on the 21st instant and by the Senate on the 23d instant has made it evident that I could not act upon your suggestions until it should be determined whether the bill would become a law or not. It was manifest that if the bill should become a law the negotiation and consideration of the wage matter ought to proceed in harmony therewith.

"The bill having now become a law, the way is open for immediate action on the wage matter in accordance with the terms of the bill. Section 301 of the bill evidently contemplates that the carriers and employees should, as suggested by you, select representatives who will thus constitute a bipartisan board for the purpose of attempting by conference to agree upon a solution of this wage problem. In accordance with the assurance I gave last August and repeated in substance in my letter of the 13th instant, I shall at once request the carriers and the employees to join in this action. I believe such a step will go far toward clarifying and maturing the subject for final disposition. In fact, the sort of board thus contemplated by section 301 appears to be an appropriate substitute for the committee of experts which I have heretofore suggested, and indeed such a board will be authorized to go further than such a committee could have gone.

DIFFERS AS TO LABOR BOARD.

"While it is true that the provisions of section 307 of the railroad bill relating to the labor board will probably also come into operation as to this wage matter, nevertheless the bipartisan board can make a great deal of progress which will materially diminish the time to be consumed by the labor board; and while the bipartisan board is functioning, the appointment and organization of the labor board can be expedited.

"I can not share the apprehension of yourselves and your constituents as to the provisions of the law concerning the labor board. I believe those provisions are not only appropriate in the interest of the public, which, after all, is principally composed of workers and their families, but will be found to be particularly in the interest of railroad employees as a class.

"The argument that the public representatives on the labor board will be prejudiced against labor because drawn from classes of society antagonistic to labor can and ought to be overcome by selecting such public representatives as can not be charged with any such prejudices. Nor do I anticipate that the public representatives will be against wage increases because they involve rate increases. Not only must public representatives be selected who can be relied upon to do justice, but the bill itself provides that the labor board shall establish rates and wages and salaries which in the opinion of the board are 'just and reasonable'; and it is further provided that the entire labor board shall be guided by the very important standards which are provided in the law, those standards including the wages paid for similar kinds of work in other industries, the relation between wages and the cost of living, the hazards of the employment, the training and skill required, the degree of responsibility, the character and irregularity of the employment, and the correction of inequalities as the result of previous adjustments. Coupled with the direction to the labor board to take into consideration these important standards is the highly important direction to the commission to prescribe rates sufficient to admit of the payment of the reasonable operating expenses, including, of course, fair rates of wages.

EXPECTS NEW WAGE ERA.

"My hopes are that the putting into effect of these provisions with a carefully selected labor board whose public representatives can be relied upon to be fair to labor and to appreciate the point of view of labor that it is not longer to be considered as a mere commodity will mark the beginning of a new era of better understanding between the railroad managements and their employees, and will furnish additional safeguards to the just interests of railroad labor.

"I am sure that every agency which will be involved in the creation of the labor board and in the conduct of negotiations fully appreciates that the wage demands are entitled to the earliest possible consideration and disposition, and therefore I do not anticipate delay in the appointment and organization of the labor board or in the other necessary steps.

"Sincerely, yours,

"WOODROW WILSON.

"Messrs. B. M. Jewell, W. S. Stone, Timothy Shea, L. E. Sheppard, W. G. Lee, S. E. Heberling, E. J. Manion, James W. Kline, William H. Johnston, M. F. Ryan, Louis Weyand, John J. Hines, James Noonan, James J. Forrester, and D. W. Helt."

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 17, 1920.

To the Members of the Congress of the United States.

GENTLEMEN: The organizations whose names are attached respectfully urge the defeat of the conference report for the return of the railroads to their owners.

These organizations are fairly representative of the mass of the people of the United States. They represent directly 2,000,000 organized workers.

We believe that we may claim to reflect the wishes, opinions, and interests of a great majority of the people of the country. Certainly we have no sinister interest in the railway question.

Speaking in our official capacity, we earnestly urge that Federal operation of the railroads be continued for at least two years more, in order that a reasonable test may be made of Federal operation under normal conditions, so as to ascertain whether the Government can not operate the railroads more cheaply, more efficiently, and more satisfactorily to the country than is possible by private operators interested only in the making of profits.

The railroad question is exclusively a public question. Railroads should be agencies of service, not profit. America is the only nation in the world of any importance that even contemplates the private operation of its transportation agencies.

We urge the continuation of Federal control for the following reasons:

1. The reports of the Director General of Railroads indicate that the railroads are on a paying basis, or are in a fair way to earn all charges against them and possibly accumulate a surplus.

2. A return of the railroads means an increase in the rates of from 25 to 50 per cent. This means an addition of freight rates of at least $1,000,000,000 a year. It may be much more. According to the estimates of the Director General and Interstate Commerce Commissioner Woolley, this will involve a cumulative increase in added costs to the public of from three billion to five billion dollars a year.

3. Such an increase in railway costs will be shifted to the consumer, already struggling under an unbearable living cost. It will be shifted to food, to fuel, to building materials, to everything the people use. It can not be otherwise. Much of the railway rate increases must be borne by the producing classes, and especially by the workers and the farmers.

4. The railroad owners and executives are urging the validation of watered securities of many billions of dollars. This is one of the main objects desired by the railroads. They desire, first, a guaranteed subsidy, and, second, the underwriting of 50 years of railway exploitation.

5. We protest against the subsidizing of any industry or the guaranteeing of a return to stockholders. There is no more reason for the subsidizing of the railroads than there is for thousands of other corporations that have suffered as a result of the war. The demand of the railroads can, with perfect propriety, be urged by street railways, by electric-lighting corporations, by other corporations, and even by individuals.

The subsidization of any industry is contrary to American traditions.

6. The Cummins-Esch bill, with its guaranty of earnings, is an invitation to waste and extravagance. If guaranteed a return, railway operators will be under no impulsion to keep down their own salaries, to buy cheaply, or to operate the railroads efficiently. Waste is inevitable under any kind of a guaranty of earnings. This is especially true with railway officers and stockholders, interested as they are in every kind of supply bought by the railroads.

7. Bankruptcy, we believe, is inevitable if the railroads are returned. For two years traffic has been short-routed. It has been sent over selected lines. A great part of the mileage of the country is not earning operating expenses and fixed charges. Receiverships are inevitable if the railroads are unscrambled and each one left to shift for itself.

8. Railway bankruptcy in the United States may bring on a panic. Railway securities and Government bonds are almost the only solvent securities in America. They form the basis of a great part of our credit. If they tumble, industry may tumble with them.

9. World-wide bankruptcy may result from such a collapse. The credit of the world rests in America. If the financial structure of America collapses, there may be a world collapse.

10. Return of the railroads to their owners means their return to Wall Street. It means a return to J. P. Morgan & Co., the National City Bank, the First National Bank, and Kuhn, Loeb & Co. For proof of this fact we refer you to the report of the Pujo investigating committee made to Congress in 1913.

Congress should at least return the railroads to their owners, rather than to incompetent banking managers. It should return them to clean hands, not to the men who bankrupt the New Haven, the Rock Island, the Pere Marquette, the Frisco, the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton, and a score of other profitable corporations.

11. Our foreign trade is dependent upon a highly mobilized and unified transportation system. Germany, France, and England own and operate their railroads and are using them to build up their foreign trade.

12. An increase in freight rates must be borne largely by the farmers. The price of farm produce is fixed in the markets of the world. If freight rates are increased, the amount the farmer receives will be diminished to that extent.

13. Industrial unrest is universal. It is born of the labor shortage on the one hand and the high cost of living on the other. The return of the railroads at this time is an invitation to still further industrial disturbances.

14. The banking groups which control the railroads also control all of the major trusts. They control anthracite and bituminous coal; they control iron and steel; they control all kinds of food supplies; they control the five packing plants; they are interlaced with all of the major trusts.

Under these conditions the banking-railway managers will inevitably use their power to aid the monopolies which they control. In some way or other they can grant preferential rates. The Standard Oil Co., the Anthracite Coal Trust, the Packers' Trust, the Steel Trust, the great trusts of America were built up by discriminating freight rates. Neither the law nor the Interstate Commerce Commission can prevent such discriminations.

No single thing will be a graver menace to the productive resources of America than to place the railroads in the hands of men to whose interest it is to strangle competition.

15. Under Federal operation the Southern States of America have had a square deal. Ports, harbors, terminals, and shipping lines have been stimulated from the Rio Grande to Baltimore. Railway executives of the lines leading into New York have announced that they will resume the preferential treatment of New York. This will kill southern ports, southern shipping, southern industry.

16. Federal administration has made colossal savings, economies, efficiencies. It has consolidated terminals. It has merged car, motive, and other equipment. It has increased the car equipment of the country alone by 300,000 cars. A freight car is at home to-day any place in the United States. This is equivalent to adding $900,000,000 to the assets of the railroads. Needless passenger trains have been taken off, many officials have been released, high salaries have been cut down.

The economies so introduced, as reported by the regional directors of the railroads, amount to at least $200,000,000 a year.

17. The railroads of the country have destroyed water competition on which the Government has expended hundreds of millions of dollars. Water competition is cheap. It menaces railroad earnings. We can never use the Great Lakes, our rivers, or develop coastal trade so long as the railroads are in private hands and find it in their interest to smother and destroy water competition by denying it terminal facilities, proper connections, and other opportunities to live.

18. Director General McAdoo, as well as Interstate Commerce Commissioner Woolley, have urged the electrification of the railroads or the building of central power stations at the mines. They have indicated colossal savings from the elimination of the haulage and consumption of coal. Coal alone costs the railroads $400,000,000 a year. The railroads will not electrify the lines. It will destroy the best market for coal which railroad operators themselves own. It will cut into their profits as coal operators. The United States will only electrify the lines by Government action.

19. Transportation is the most vital agency in the economic and industrial life of a nation. It vitally affects every man, woman, and child in the country. It determines the amount of wealth produced. It decides for us what section of the country shall grow and what section shall not. It determines the prosperity or failure of industry. It controls the life of the farmer. It affects 2,000,000 employees. It is far and away the most important industry in the country. On it every other industry and every other worker depend.

20. Before the railroads are returned we believe a thorough study should be made of the transportation needs and possibilities of the country. It should be such an inquiry as was made of banking and credit prior to the passage of the Federal reserve banking act. It should be broad enough to include the economies and efficiencies from the merger of rail and water transportation, from unification of terminals, of shops, of rolling stock, and motive power. A study should be made of water transportation and electrification. A similar inquiry should be made as to decentralization of administration.

A matter of most vital interest is the enlisting of the employees so that they will work harmoniously, willingly, and efficiently. It is a colossal waste to exclude from railway operation the contributions of 2,000,000 men with lifelong experience in the railway industry.

The development of southern and Pacific ports should be studied so as to promote South American, Asiatic, and foreign trade.

The railroad question is an industrial question. It is a social question. It is far more than a question involving the dividends to stockholders or the wages of employees. It is a question that involves every industrial activity of the country.

Believing that the return of the railroads under the terms proposed in the pending bills neglects all these questions and makes their solution impossible; believing, further, that the provisions for a subsidy and for the utilization of public funds by private individuals is a betrayal of the public interest and is subversive of the traditions of the country; believing that the pending bills are an invitation to waste; believing that the worker and the farmer will be made to pay tribute to financial exploitation and that the people will be called upon to bear an unnecessary load, measured by billions of dollars, that will be saved by Government control; believing that the return of the railroads at this time is as calamitous a proposal as could be conceived—believing in all these things, we feel justified in protesting with all the emphasis at our command against the passage of the pending railroad bill.

We beg to remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 11 o'clock and 33 minutes a. m.). Morning business is closed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12467, known as the Military Academy appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12467) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, at the top of page 2, to strike out the subhead "Permanent establishment" and insert the heading "Permanent establishment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 5, after the word "sword," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,500, and the present incumbent shall have the relative rank and allowances of a lieutenant colonel during his incumbency," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of master of sword, $3,500, and the present incumbent shall have the relative rank and allowances of a lieutenant colonel during his incumbency.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On page 2, line 5, before the word "sword," I move to insert the article "the," so as to read "For pay of master of the sword," which is the correct title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 2, line 9, before the word "pay," to strike out "Provided, That the" and insert "The," and in line 13, after the word "Army," to insert "Provided, That the sum of $250 shall be credited to each cadet now at the academy and to each cadet discharged since January 1, 1919, to the extent of paying any balance due by any such cadet to the academy on account of such initial clothing and equipment issued to him," so as to make the clause read:

The pay of cadets for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall be fixed at $780 per annum and one ration per day or commutation thereof at the rate of $1.08 per ration, to be paid from the appropriation for the subsistence of the Army: Provided, That the sum of $250 shall be credited to each cadet now at the academy and to each cadet discharged since January 1, 1919, to the extent of paying any balance due by any such cadet to the academy on account of such initial clothing and equipment issued to him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 18, to insert as a subhead the following:

Officers on detached service at the academy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment commencing in line 13 was agreed to be reconsidered in order that I may make a small correction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In line 17 I move that the word "such," before the word "initial," be eliminated.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before the question is put to a vote, may I ask is the $250 provided for in the amendment of the committee in addition to the allowances which have heretofore been made to the cadets?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In reply to the question of the Senator from Ohio, I wish to state that at the present time the pay of a cadet is $780 a year. On his entrance to the academy he is compelled to purchase articles which he needs during his term amounting to $416, and he is compelled to advance in cash $160 to the academy. At the present estimated prices these articles cost $416. The pay of $780 is absolutely absorbed during the year, and at the end of the four years the cadet goes out of the academy $250 in debt for necessary articles purchased during his term, including initial equipment.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not ask the question because I was objecting to the amendment. The subject has been called to my attention heretofore, and I was interested in knowing that the committee have provided additional pay or compensation. I wanted that made perfectly clear. I think the committee is to be commended for making this recommendation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 7, after the word "quarters," to strike out "appropriated for by act of Congress No. 179 (65th Cong.)" and insert "authorized in the Military Academy appropriation act for 1919," and, in line 9, after "1918," to insert "to be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

(d) The course at the United States Military Academy shall be four years: Provided, That any person heretofore nominated in accordance with regulations for appointment to fill a vacancy which would have resulted from the graduation of a cadet during the present year, may be so appointed notwithstanding the retention of such cadet at the academy: Provided further, That any cadet entitled to graduate in 1920 may, at his option, exercised before June 11, 1920, continue his course for one year, and that any cadet of the class of 1920, who may have been found deficient in his studies shall also have the right to reenter and continue his course for a like period of one year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On page 29, line 13, after the word "course," I move to insert the words "of instruction."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. After the word "course," in the House text, on page 29, line 13, it is proposed to insert the words "of instruction," so that, if amended, it will read:

The course of instruction at the United States Military Academy, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 29, line 25, before "1318," to strike out "Provided further, That section" and insert "(e) Section," so as to make the clause read:

(e) Section 1318, Revised Statutes, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows: "Appointees shall be admitted to the academy only between the ages of 17 and 22 years, except in the following case: That during the calendar years 1919, 1920, and 1921 any appointee who has served honorably and faithfully not less than one year in the armed forces of the United States or allied armies in the late war with Germany, and who possesses the other qualifications required by law, may be admitted between the ages of 17 and 24 years: Provided, That whenever any member of the graduating class shall fail to complete the course with his class by reason of sickness, or deficiency in his studies, or other cause, such failure shall not operate to delay the admission of his successor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 12, to insert:

(f) The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to allow any corporation, company, or individual to erect on the United States Military Academy reservation at West Point, N. Y., a hotel, in accordance with plans and specifications to be approved by the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy, and to enjoy the revenue therefrom for a period of 50 years; after which time said hotel shall become the property of the United States: Provided, That the title and ownership of said hotel may be accepted by the Secretary of War on the behalf of the United States at any time. That said hotel shall be conducted under such regulations as may be promulgated by the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. At the end of line 17 I move to insert a hyphen. It is merely a question of punctuation.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator in charge of the bill with respect to this amendment. I can understand the amendment thoroughly down to a certain point. It is an amendment which authorizes the Secretary of War to allow any corporation, company, or individual to build a hotel at West Point, and, after enjoying the revenue from it for 50 years, to turn it over to the United States; but I do not understand the proviso. The proviso says:

That the title and ownership of said hotel may be accepted by the Secretary of War on the behalf of the United States at any time.

I do not know whether that means that the Secretary can buy it at any time, or that he can accept it as a gift at any time, or what it does mean.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] conducted the hearing when this matter was under consideration. Perhaps he can answer the question.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania, I will say that this is a provision of existing law. That proviso is in the law now.

Mr. KNOX. Can the Senator tell me what it means?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know that I can, except that if the owner of the hotel should be so foolish as to convey it to the United States Government without cost, the Secretary of War is authorized to accept it.

Mr. KNOX. That, of course, would not be an objection to it; but I can not imagine anybody being so foolish as to give away a hotel.

Mr. LENROOT. I can not, either; but the objection to the existing law was that under existing law the Secretary of War is given the right to control the rates and charges of the hotel, and it was represented to the committee that because of that provision they could get no offers whatever for the construction of a hotel; so in this amendment the committee merely eliminates from existing law the right to regulate the charges of the hotel.

Mr. KNOX. And the committee left the provision of the existing law that the Secretary could graciously accept the donation of a hotel at any time?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 25, to insert:

(g) The Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, in his discretion, authorized to select and permit one Panaman student, without expense to the United States, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point, and such student, while undergoing instruction as herein authorized, shall be accorded the same privileges as are authorized by law for cadets at the Military Academy appointed from the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, after line 6, to insert:

(h) Hereafter, whenever all vacancies at the Military Academy shall not have been filled as the result of the regular annual entrance examination, the remaining vacancies shall be filled by admission from the whole list of alternates selected in their order of merit established at such entrance examinations: Provided, That in filling vacancies to the credit of a State the list of alternates nominated from that State shall first be exhausted before selections are made from any other State to fill such vacancies. The admissions thus made, except as herein otherwise provided, shall be credited to the United States at large and shall not interfere with or affect in any manner whatsoever any appointment authorized by existing law; and whenever by the operation of this or any other law the Corps of Cadets exceeds the authorized maximum strength as provided by law, the admission of alternates as prescribed in this act shall cease until such time as said corps may be reduced to its authorized strength.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As a perfecting amendment to the committee amendment, I move to strike out of line 22 the word "to" before "its" and to insert the word "below," so that it will read "until such time as said corps may be reduced below its authorized strength."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If there are no further committee amendments, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. After it is read I desire to make a brief statement with reference to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill the following:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Edward W. Whitaker, late lieutenant colonel First Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Cavalry, and brevet brigadier general, United States Volunteers, a lieutenant colonel of Cavalry in the Army of the United States; and when so appointed he shall be placed upon the retired list of the Army, unlimited, with the pay and emoluments of a retired officer of that grade, the retired list being thereby increased in number to that extent: Provided, That on receiving the said retired pay under this act he shall relinquish all his right and claim to pension from the United States thereafter, and any payment made to him covering a period subsequent to the date of his commission as a retired officer shall be deducted from the amount due him on the first payment under this act: Provided further, That no back pay, allowances, or other emoluments, except his pay as a retired lieutenant colonel of Cavalry, shall accrue as a result of the passage of this act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a bill for this purpose has been passed several times by the Senate at different sessions, and it was passed September 22, 1919, according to the indorsement of the Secretary of the Senate on the bill which the Secretary has just read as an amendment. I should like to have it placed as an amendment upon this bill, so that it may stand a better chance of receiving consideration in the House, where, as we know, the legislative machinery is so blocked that it is very difficult to get a bill up from the calendar.

The record of this gentleman, who is now 77 years old, and who was a Union soldier at the age of 19, is most distinguished and is to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 24, 1916, printed upon pages 6709 and following of the RECORD. I ask that it and the report of the then chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] upon a similar bill, being Report No. 281 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, second session; also the report of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] upon Senate bill 861, being Report No. 150 of the Sixty-sixth Congress, first session; the report of former Senator Catron, being Report No. 308, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session; and also the findings of fact and conclusion of the Court of Claims in the case may be printed in the RECORD as explanatory of the provisions of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CASE OF EDWARD W. WHITAKER, LATE CORPORAL, COMPANY A, FIRST REGIMENT CONNECTICUT INFANTRY VOLUNTEERS; FIRST LIEUTENANT COMPANY C, AND CAPTAIN COMPANY D, SECOND NEW YORK CAVALRY VOLUNTEERS; CAPTAIN COMPANY E AND LIEUTENANT COLONEL FIRST CONNECTICUT CAVALRY VOLUNTEERS; AND BREVET BRIGADIER GENERAL, UNITED STATES VOLUNTEERS.

"Reports in the case of this officer have been furnished to Congress by this department on dates and in connection with measures as follows: June 29, 1906, to the chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, in connection with House bill No. 20388, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, proposing to appoint Gen. Whitaker as captain, United States Army, and place him on the retired list; January 27, 1908, to the chairman Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate, in connection with Senate bill No. 4193, Sixtieth Congress, first session, of the same import as the measure referred to, and in connection with this measure supplementary data were furnished on February 12, 1908, to the same committee; January 16, 1911, to the chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, in connection with House bill No. 6608, Sixty-first Congress, first session, of the same import, with the recommendation by this department that the bill do not receive favorable consideration; February 26, 1912, to the chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, in connection with House bill No. 18540, Sixty-second Congress, second session, proposing to appoint him as lieutenant colonel of Cavalry, United States Army, and place him on the retired list; May 13, 1912, to the chairman Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate, in connection with Senate bill No. 6274, Sixty-second Congress, second session, of the same import; and February 6, 1913, to Hon. J. L. Bristow, for use in connection with Senate resolution No. 348, Sixty-second Congress, second session, proposing to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to furnish the Senate with a full and detailed statement of his military history, with the recommendation by this department that the resolution be not adopted.

"Although the reports referred to hereinbefore set forth the information ordinarily furnished in connection with proposed legislation of this character, yet Gen. Whitaker has been dissatisfied with those reports, because they do not furnish all the details of his military service, and he has repeatedly importuned this department to supply Congress with a full and detailed statement of his military career. The Secretary of War has finally directed that a full report be furnished in the case, setting forth every record found regarding the military services of the officer. Such a report, based upon the official records in the War Department, is set forth hereinafter, and this report includes every item that has been found in those records relative to the military services of this officer.

"Edward W. Whitaker was enrolled April 19, 1861, at Hartford, Conn., and was mustered into the military service of the United States April 22, 1861, as a corporal of Company A, First Connecticut Infantry Volunteers, to serve three months, his age at the time being stated on the records as 20 years. It appears that he served faithfully as a member of the organization until July 31, 1861, when he was mustered out and honorably discharged from service with the company, at New Haven Conn., as a corporal.

"The said Whitaker was again enrolled August 21, 1861, at Hartford, Conn., and was mustered into service August 29, 1861, at Camp Lyon, N. Y., as a sergeant of Capt. Thornett's company, Harris's Light Cavalry, which was also known as Company D, Second New York Cavalry Volunteers, to serve three years. It appears that he was present for duty with the company as a sergeant until January 10, 1862, when he was promoted to be quartermaster sergeant thereof in a regimental order bearing that date. He was accounted for on the rolls of the company as quartermaster sergeant thereafter until August 14, 1862, when, upon the recommendation of the captain in command of the company, he was promoted to be first (or orderly) sergeant thereof. He performed duty as such until September 24, 1862, when he was detailed as sergeant major of the regiment, and while so serving an order was issued from the headquarters of the organization, on November 16, 1862, in which it was announced that he was thereby appointed regimental sergeant major, to date from September 24, 1862. By reason of this appointment, he was transferred from Company D to the noncommissioned staff of the regiment, and it appears that he served therewith from September 24 to November 16, 1862, to take effect from which last-named date he was mustered out as regimental sergeant major, near Belle Plain, Va., to enable him to accept promotion.

"On January 10, 1863, the commanding officer of the Second New York Cavalry Volunteers addressed a communication to the adjutant general of the State of New York, forwarding for the consideration of the governor of that State a recommendation that Whitaker be promoted to be second lieutenant, vice another officer who was promoted to a higher grade November 16, 1862. The recommendation made by the regimental commander was favorably considered, and on January 22, 1863, a commission was issued by the governor, in which it was recited that Whitaker was thereby appointed to be a second lieutenant in the Second New York Cavalry Volunteers, to rank as such from November 16, 1862.

"On February 10, 1863, Whitaker received a leave of absence and it appears that he remained absent from the regiment thereafter until on or about February 27, 1863, when he was mustered into service as second lieutenant of Company C, same regiment, entries appearing upon the muster-in roll purporting to show that the muster in was to date from November 16, 1862. He was accounted for as present for duty with Company C on February 28, 1863; as officer of the guard March 2, 1863, and as officer of the day March 13, 1863. Shortly thereafter he was detailed as acting adjutant of the regiment and signed orders as such from March 26 to April 12, 1863.

"On April 9, 1863, the commanding officer of the regiment addressed a communication to the adjutant general of the State of New York in which he recommended that Whitaker be promoted to be first lieutenant of Company C, Second New York Cavalry, vice another officer promoted to a higher grade on March 16, 1863. The recommendation was considered favorably and he was duly appointed by the governor of New York as of that grade, to rank as such from March 16, 1863. He was not formally mustered into service as first lieutenant until September 10, 1863, when he was so mustered in to date from June 11, 1863. It appears, however, that he actually performed the duties of a first lieutenant from March 16, 1863, and upon application for recognition as first lieutenant from that date, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1884, and the acts amendatory thereof, he was and is recognized by the War Department as having been in the military service of the United States as first lieutenant from March 17, 1863, the earliest date on which a vacancy existed for him as first lieutenant in the organization mentioned.

"It appears from the records that the officer was performing the duties of first lieutenant with Company C, or was acting as adjutant of the regiment, thereafter until on or about June 13, 1863, when he was detailed as aid-de-camp on the staff of Brig. Gen. J. Kilpatrick, who was then in command of the Second Brigade, Second Division, Cavalry Corps. While so serving he made application, in a letter dated at Aldie, Va., June 18, 1863, for permission to take home to Connecticut the bodies of his brother and one other officer, killed in an engagement on the preceding day. The application was approved and forwarded through military channels, but nothing has been found of record to show specifically whether the leave asked for was granted.

"The officer was accounted for on the company records dated June 30, 1863, and for the month of July, 1863, as absent, aid-de-camp to Gen. Kilpatrick. On July 30, 1863, he was admitted to the Seminary General Hospital at Georgetown, D. C., suffering with intermittent fever, and the records of the hospital indicate that he remained in that institution and was under treatment continuously thereafter, for the disease mentioned, until August 31, 1863, when he was pronounced fit for duty and ordered to rejoin the command to which he belonged.

"In a report dated August 10, 1863, relative to the part taken by the Third Division in the Maryland and Pennsylvania campaign (the full text of which report is printed in the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies, Series I, Vol. XXVII, pp. 991-996), Gen. Kilpatrick, then in command of the division, mentioned Whitaker, in referring to an engagement of July 6, 1863, near Williamsport, Md., as follows:

"'* * * I can not pass over this engagement without mentioning a few among the many individual cases of gallantry that came under my own observation: * * * The officers of my regular staff, * * * Lieut. Whitaker * * *, all did their duty in this engagement, as they have in all others, like brave and gallant gentlemen.'

"On August 16, 1863, an order was issued, a pertinent extract of which is as follows:

"[General Order No. 7.]

"HEADQUARTERS THIRD DIVISION, CAVALRY CORPS,
"Hartwood Church, Va., August 16, 1863.

"The following-named officers are hereby announced as the staff of the brigadier general commanding division. They will be obeyed and respected accordingly: * * * Lieut. E. W. Whitaker, Second New York Cavalry, aid-de-camp * * *.

"By command of Brig. Gen. J. Kilpatrick.

"L. G. ESTES, A. A. A. G.

"On records of the Third Division, Cavalry Corps, Army of the Potomac, for the months of August and September, 1863, Whitaker was accounted for as an aid-de-camp on the staff of the officer in command of the division, Gen. Kilpatrick.

"In a report dated October 26, 1863, printed in the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies, Series I, Volume XXIX, Part I, Brig. Gen. Henry Prince mentioned Whitaker three different times as the representative of Gen. Kilpatrick, and again in a report printed on pages 328–329 of the same volume he was referred to as having furnished information to the commanding officer of the One hundred and twentieth Regiment, New York State Volunteers.

"On October 29, 1863, Whitaker was detailed as judge advocate in an order, a pertinent extract of which is as follows:

"[General Orders, No. 24.]

"HEADQUARTERS THIRD DIVISION, CAVALRY CORPS,
"October 29, 1863.

"* * * Lieut. E. W. Whitaker, A. D. C. to Brig. Gen. Kilpatrick, is hereby detailed as judge advocate, general court-martial, convened by General Orders, No. 22, Headquarters, Third Cavalry Division, October 28, 1863.

"By command of Brig. Gen. Kilpatrick.

"In a report of Brig. Gen. H. E. Davies, jr., dated November 18, 1863, the full text of which is printed on pages 656 and 657 of the volume last mentioned hereinbefore, Whitaker was referred to as follows:

"'Last evening I received instructions from Gen. Custer to detail from this command an escort to accompany Lieut. Whitaker and another officer in a reconnoissance to be made this morning at daylight to Elys Ford. In pursuance of this an order was sent Capt. Kingsland to furnish Lieut. Whitaker with 60 men for that purpose. Capt. Kingsland had also been previously instructed at daylight this morning to move his main reserve camp nearer to Stevensburg, leaving 50 men at the position he was holding. Lieut. Whitaker reached the headquarters of the regiment before daylight, and reveille was sounded and the whole command aroused. Lieut. Whitaker and an orderly from my headquarters who accompanied him both concur in saying that the horses in the camp were all saddled and bridled. * * *

"'The party in charge of Lieut. Whitaker, which I have mentioned, had proceeded nearly 2 miles on the road to Germanna Ford when they heard the firing and countermarched. On nearing the camp of the regiment they encountered what all concur in stating was a regiment of cavalry drawn up in a field on the right of the road, which charged them. The men retreated into the woods on the left of the road and skirmished for some time, but were obliged to fall back. The majority of them succeeded in reaching their regiment.'

"The officer was accounted for on November 3 and 30, 1863, as aid-de-camp on the staff of the officer in command of the Third Division, Cavalry Corps, Army of the Potomac, Gen. Kilpatrick, and on December 1, 1863, reported to The Adjutant General of the Army as follows:

"'* * * I then moved toward Richmond, passing Ashland station about a mile to my left and crossing the Richmond & Fredericksburg Railroad some 2 miles below Ashland. "By command of Gen. Grant.
"E. D. TOWNSEND,
"Assistant Adjutant General.

"In the meantime the colonel commanding the Second Regiment New York Cavalry Volunteers, in a letter dated March 29, 1864, addressed to the adjutant general of New York, recommended certain promotions in the regiment, among them being a recommendation that Whitaker be commissioned as a captain in the regiment, referring to him in terms as follows:

"'* * * The above-named commissioned and noncommissioned officers are all well deserving their promotions, and none of them more than Lieut. Whitaker, who is one of the ablest and most trustworthy officers of this command; and I would most respectfully request that the above recommendations be confirmed.'

"Whitaker was duly appointed by the governor of New York as a captain in the Second New York Cavalry, in a commission issued April 29, 1864, to rank as such from January 30, 1864, which commission, it will be observed, was issued on the date of his first discharge order as a member of that organization. He was not mustered into service as of that grade and organization in the Civil War, but under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1884, and the acts amendatory thereof, he was, and is, recognized by the War Department as having been in the military service of the United States in the grade of captain of Company D of the regiment from January 30, 1864, and as having been discharged from service as such instead of as first lieutenant, the grade set forth in his discharge order.

"It is stated on the records of the Second New York Cavalry that the officer was 20 years of age at the date of his enlistment; that he was born in Killingly, Conn., and was by occupation a teacher; that he was 6 feet high; and that he had light complexion, blue eyes, and light-brown hair.

"The said Whitaker was duly appointed by the governor of Connecticut to be a captain in the First Regiment Connecticut Cavalry Volunteers, to rank as such from April 23 or 25, 1864, and the receipt of the commission, as such, as indicated by a certificate, of which the following is a copy:

"HEADQUARTERS THIRD DIVISION CAVALRY CORPS,

"OFFICE AID-DE-CAMP OF MUSTERS,
"May 2, 1864.

"I certify on honor that E. W. Whitaker, first lieutenant Company C, Second Regiment New York Cavalry, received May 1 from the governor of Connecticut a commission as captain in the First Regiment Connecticut Cavalry, bearing date April 25, and can be mustered in to date, May 1, 1864.

"JACOB BRISTOL,
"First Lieutenant, Fifth Michigan Cavalry,
"Aid-de-Camp of Musters, Third Division Cavalry Corps,
"Army of the Potomac.

"Whitaker was mustered into service as captain in the First Connecticut Cavalry Volunteers May 3, 1864, at Stevensburg, Va., to serve three years, and entries appearing upon the individual muster-in roll, as such, show that he entered upon the performance of duty as captain on May 3, 1864, the date of the muster. He was assigned to Company E of the regiment, and on the records of the company he was accounted for as on detached service from May 3, 1864 (the date of his muster in as captain), as acting aid-de-camp on the staff of Gen. Wilson, then in command of the Third Division, Cavalry Corps, Army of the Potomac. On a record of the latter command for the month of May, 1864, Whitaker was accounted for as an acting aid-de-camp on the staff of the general commanding; in a communication dated June 2, 1864, he was referred to as such; and in a report dated July 4, 1864, relative to the part taken by the Cavalry Division in the expedition to destroy the Richmond & Danville Railroad, Brig. Gen. Kautz stated that during the night of June 23, 1864, 'Capt. Whitaker, of Gen. Wilson's staff, reached me and reported the enemy in between our commands opposing his advance.'

"In a report relative to the part taken by troops under his command in an expedition against the South Side and Danville Railroads, dated July 3, 1864, and printed on pages 625–630, Series I, volume 40, part 1, of the publication mentioned hereinbefore, Gen. Wilson referred to Whitaker as follows:

"'* * * The First Brigade was held on the road to Hungarytown in order that when Kautz's position became known exactly I might have choice of roads and the certainty of forming a junction with him. Capt. Whitaker, of my staff, was detached, with a squadron, to communicate with him. He carried orders for Kautz to join by the road from the railroad junction to Lewiston, in case he found it necessary to leave the railroad.

"'The advance reached Wylliesburg by daylight on the morning of the 26th and halted. * * * Early the next morning the march was resumed, the column crossing the Meherrin at Saffold's Bridge and going thence east to Great Creek, on the Boydton Plank Road. From this place it moved to Poplar Mountain, in Greensville County, crossing the Nottoway at the Double Bridges, near the mouth of Hardwood Creek. I arrived there about noon on the 28th, where I learned that the enemy had a small force of Infantry at Stony Creek Depot, on the Weldon Road, and two small detachments of Cavalry which had been cut off from Lee's division when we marched southward. The most diligent inquiry from the negroes and captured pickets gave no information of any other force. This, together with the fact that the road from Double Bridges to Prince George Courthouse passes 2 miles to the westward of Stony Creek Depot, induced me to take that route, and, accordingly, the advance was pushed forward with the utmost rapidity, with orders to drive in the reserve picket at the crossing of the road just mentioned and the one from Stony Creek Depot to Dinwiddie Court House and clear the road for the main column. This order was handsomely executed under the directions of Capt. Whitaker, of my staff, and state of affairs found to be nearly as represented. * * * In the meantime, anticipating difficulty of a serious nature, I endeavored to open communication with the Infantry in front of Petersburg, and finally detached Capt. E. W. Whitaker, First Connecticut Cavalry, of my staff, with about 40 men of the veteran Third New York Cavalry. I have since learned he succeeded in reaching Army headquarters about 10 a. m. On his way he gallantly rode through the enemy's Cavalry and Infantry columns in motion, escaping with 20 men. * * * The greatest credit is due to officers and men for their endurance, sleepless exertion, and gallantry. * * * My own staff, particularly Capt. Whitaker, First Connecticut Volunteers, * * * did their duty with great intelligence and unceasing industry.'

"With regard to military operations on June 24–29, 1864, Gen. Wilson in a report dated February 18, 1865 (published on pp. 620–625, same volume), referred to Whitaker as follows:

"'* * * Just before daylight of the 24th, having heard of Kautz's success at Burkeville through Capt. Whitaker, of my staff, whom I sent to communicate with him, I withdrew from the position near Nottoway Court House and by a rapid march through Hungarytown struck the Danville Railroad near Meherrin Station. * * * I determined, therefore, to lose no time, but push on with rapidity to that place, drive the pickets back to the Stony Creek Depot, and under cover of darkness march the whole command as rapidly as possible toward Prince George Court House. The advance guard, under the direction of Capt. Whitaker, of my staff, found the picket posted, as I expected, at the church, and by a spirited dash drove it toward the depot. This success had scarcely been reported before the enemy received reinforcements, and in turn drove back the advance guard to the head of the column. * * *

"'At 7 a. m., June 29, Gen. Kautz's advance arrived in the neighborhood of that place, but instead of finding it in the possession of the infantry of the Army of the Potomac found Hoke's division of rebel infantry strongly posted. He attacked them at once, but after capturing about 60 prisoners was compelled to withdraw his troops. By 9 a. m. the entire command was united. Having remained with McIntosh throughout the night, I did not arrive until about 8 a. m. I had previously sent Capt. Whitaker, of my staff, forward with instructions to make his way with the utmost rapidity to Gen. Meade's headquarters. * * * I confidently hoped that either the firing of our artillery or the message of Capt. Whitaker would bring troops to our assistance * * *.'

"Whitaker was also mentioned in other reports, pertinent extracts of which are as follows:

Meade that our lines had extended around to the Appomattox, or at least across the Weldon Railroad. He was, accordingly, confident of finding our pickets at Reams Station, or near there. After he crossed the Sappony, on what is called the stage road, he was attacked by Hampton's Cavalry; fought them Tuesday afternoon and night between that stream and Stony Creek, relying all the while on aid from the Army of the Potomac, which he supposed to be in hearing of his cannon. One of his aids, Capt. Whitaker, also cut his way through with a company and reported the case at Gen. Meade's, but succor could not be got up in season. * * *

"Hon. CHARLES A. DANA,
"Assistant Secretary of War.

"DEAR SIR: I am en route to rejoin and assume command of my regiment in 'Valley.' Left Gen. Wilson at Nashville, Tenn. In consideration of the fact that my accompanying him West prevented my muster in in the grade of major under the usual muster regulations, he kindly advised me to apply to you for a special order, for which I make application in the inclosed communication bearing the general's indorsement. Permit me to note there is nothing complicated or any strife in this, as the vacancy has been long open, the regiment strong enough, etc. I am at present the only major in the regiment. I simply desire my muster to date when I should have reported if not for obeying an order of same date transferring me West. Perhaps the commissary of musters (it being more simple) could be ordered to muster me in for said date, providing other circumstances in the case admit.

"Hoping you will pardon me for this intrusion on your valuable time,

"I shall ever remain your most humble and obedient servant,

"On the 13th the regiment went with the division on a reconnoissance toward Cedar Creek, returned the same day, and continued in camp till the 17th, when Capt. Morehouse was ordered to make a reconnoissance to Middletown. Finding no enemy, he returned to camp and remained till the 21st instant. He then started for Remount Camp, Pleasant Valley, Md., having in his charge the unserviceable horses of the brigade. He camped near Martinsburg that night and reached the camp on the 22d instant. Here Maj. Whitaker assumed command of the regiment, and worked diligently for the next three days in providing the men with such articles as they required.

"In his report of the Shenandoah Valley campaign, dated February 3, 1866, and printed on pages 40–57 of the volume last mentioned hereinbefore, Gen. Sheridan mentioned Whitaker in terms as follows:

* * * * * * *

"'On the 5th of February Harry Gilmor, who appeared to be the last link between Maryland and the Confederacy, and whose person I desired in order that this link might be severed, was made prisoner near Moorefield, his capture being very skillfully made by Col. (error, major and my guide only) Young, my chief of scouts, and a party under Lieut. Col. Whitaker, First Connecticut Cavalry, sent to support him. Gilmor and Mosby carried on the same style of warfare, running trains off railways, robbing the passengers, etc.'

* * * * * * *

"Again, Whitaker was mentioned in connection with the same incident, as follows:

"WINCHESTER, VA., February 6, 1865.
"(Received 1.50 p. m.)

"Maj. Gen. H. W. HALLECK,
"Chief of Staff:

"A small party, under command of Lieut. Col. Whitaker, sent out by Gen. Merritt to break up Harry Gilmor's band, at a point south of Moorefield, was quite successful. Maj. Young, of my staff and chief of scouts, captured Harry Gilmor and (did not bring him in) brought him in.

"P. H. SHERIDAN,
"Major General, Commanding.

"Whitaker made a report of the affair as follows:

"CAMP OF FIRST CONNECTICUT CAVALRY,
"NEAR WINCHESTER, VA.,
"February 8, 1865.

"MAJOR: I have the honor to report that, pursuant to instructions from general commanding corps, I collected my command for special duty, armed with sabers and pistols, and numbering 300, all from the Third Division Cavalry, at headquarters First Brigade, at 6 a. m., the 4th instant, and moved out on the Moorefield Pike for our destination. After halting three-quarters of an hour for feed and coffee at Wardensville, organized the detachments into a regiment, and having a short drill resumed the march at a rapid gait, striking the enemy's scouts, which Maj. Young quickly drove off the pike toward Harper's; column moving fast as possible, intending to surprise the enemy's camp by moonlight, but at 12.30 at night, when we had reached a covered point within 4 miles of Moorefield, the sky clouded up, which induced me to halt for rest and feed until 4 a. m. the 5th instant. In the meantime Maj. Young, who had been a short distance in my advance, was to send his scouts into town and ascertain the exact location of Gilmor's camp, which I had decided to strike at daylight. On moving out at 4 a. m., Capt. Hamilton, Eighth New York Cavalry, reported to me the loss of two men by desertion during the halt; the men being recent recruits from rebel States, I deemed it a more unfortunate event than the next fact which was reported by Maj. Young, i. e., his scouts had not been able to learn the exact whereabouts of Gilmor or his camp. Reaching the outskirts of Moorefield before light, during a heavy snow squall, I halted to await news from Maj. Young, who entered town with all of his party in search of information. I here became anxious about the loss of time and moved on, sending word to the major that he should go on down the South Fork till I found the enemy. I left a detachment from the Second Ohio Cavalry to search the town for soldiers, and moved at once across the stream and turned to the left down the South Fork, Maj. Young taking the advance, when, as it had become light enough, I discovered several of the enemy mounted and rapidly moving across the fields and hills on our right flank, taking the same direction as my column.

"On communicating the fact to the scouts a lively race set in, I following with my column in hopes of reaching their camp before the alarm, which it would appear had not before been given. The houses on the banks of the fork were being hastily searched by the scouts, when the large number of horses in the stable next the road to Mr. Randolph's house, 3 miles from Moorefield, excited much suspicion; and as Maj. Young asked the colored woman sternly, 'What soldiers were in the houses?'

she at once replied, 'Maj. Gilmor is upstairs.' Maj. Young immediately surrounded the house and seized the major and his cousin Gilmor, late from Baltimore, both in bed. On my learning that our prize had been found I halted column and prepared to resist the attack of the enemy collecting on the bluff over the house and river and on my right flank and rear. Finding the position untenable and deeming it impossible to get more of Gilmor's band from their skillfully selected position, we made haste in getting out, before which Maj. Gilmor had been brought to me and placed at the head of the column; and as his men were firing into us he shouted encouragement to them, feeling, as he afterwards said, confident of release. On the return march I placed Lieut. Brown, First Connecticut Cavalry, with 38 men who had been doing good service on the Petersburg Road, in the rear, he having 15 Spencers for that use, with which he successfully checked each dash of the enemy. I took the Romney Pike by advice of Maj. Young, who took the advance, and turned over to me at different points on the route 12 men captured about houses. The enemy last troubled my column as we were feeding at a point 35 miles from Moorefield and 8 from Romney. Though night had come on I did not think it wise to halt with prisoners, but resumed the march in passing Hanging Rock Gap and reached Big Capon Bridge after midnight, when we halted for rest until daylight, the 6th instant, on the forenoon of which I reached Winchester with prisoners, having ridden near 140 miles in a little over 48 hours, over a mountainous country, across swollen streams filled with floating ice, and within the enemy's lines, fully accomplishing the object of the expedition without the loss of a man.

"I can not commend too highly the zeal and hearty cooperation evinced by Maj. Young, commanding Gen. Sheridan's scouts, who accompanied me. To his personal gallantry is due the successful 'bearding of the lion in his den.'

"To the officers commanding the detachments from the Second Ohio, Eighth New York, First New Hampshire, Twenty-second New York, and First Connecticut Cavalry Regiments, I desire to express my thanks for prompt obedience to orders and strict attention to the care of their commands, on which I confidently relied in anticipation of a better test than was offered. To Surg. G. A. Hurlbut, First Connecticut Cavalry, who accompanied me with ambulance, attendants, etc., I owe much for valuable assistance rendered outside of his duties. He safely brought in two sick men and one accidentally wounded, who were unable to ride.

"Respectfully submitted.

"The result of the attempt to recapture the general officers is set forth in a report as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS THIRD DIVISION CAVALRY,
"MIDDLE MILITARY DIVISION,
"February 23, 1865.

"CAPTAIN: I have the honor to report that pursuant to instructions from general commanding division to recapture general officers taken by enemy at Cumberland, Md., early the 21st instant, I moved at 9 a. m. that day, with 340 men, for Moorefield, Va., which point I reached at 1.30 p. m. the 22d instant, and there learned that the enemy, with important prisoners, had crossed the Moorefield and Winchester Pike 2 miles from town at about 1 p. m. the 21st instant, and that a party of Federal cavalry from New Creek were in the town immediately after but had returned. I at once sent an officer to communicate with the latter force—the camp fires could be seen about 5 miles out of Moorefield—and then returned to the trail of the enemy, which I carefully examined and found to have been made by about 50 mounted men in crossing my route, apparently in haste, obliquely, and from northwest to southeast, from a wooded path on my right down a steep declivity into woods on my left. Here obtaining conclusive proof that the trail was made at or about 1 p. m. the previous day, giving the enemy over 12 hours in my advance, I decided to not pursue, my horses having been badly jaded in breaking a foot of snow over the mountains and in consideration of the prospects of not overtaking the enemy till he had reached assistance in the valley. The citizens stated he had discovered the near approach of the New Creek Cavalry. The prospect of rain induced me to return rapidly campward, via the Back Creek Road.

"The officer whom I sent to communicate with the New Creek Cavalry soon rejoined me, with verbal statement from Col. Greenfield, Twenty-second Pennsylvania Cavalry, to the effect that his advance, 400 men, under a major, had seen the enemy with prisoners between 1 and 2 p. m. the day previous moving off from the Romney and Moorefield pike, with such an accession to their numbers as to make an attack on them hazardous; therefore he had not attacked them, but desired to cooperate with me if I was about to pursue. I had moved out too far to return a reply, and still continued march, with occasional annoyances from bushwackers in rear, to Cacapon bridge, where bivouacked last night, arriving in camp at noon to-day after much trouble in crossing the rapidly swelling streams.

"My loss was none, except in horses, a few. Four of enemy taken prisoners en route.

"I desire to express my thanks to Maj. McClong, Third New Jersey Cavalry, and Lieut. Haswell, Gen. Custer's escort, First Vermont Cavalry, for zealous aid and hearty cooperation in efforts to accomplish the object of the expedition, which I much regret to report a failure.

"A record of the Third Cavalry Division, Middle Military Division, for the month of February, 1865, accounts for this officer as acting assistant inspector general on the staff of the general commanding.

"In a report of Gen. Merritt relative to operations of Cavalry forces, dated May 7, 1865, and printed on pages 484 to 488, part 1, Volume XLVI, same publication as the one referred to hereinbefore, Whitaker was referred to as follows:

* * * * * * *

"'March 2, the command arriving at Staunton, a force was detached from the First Division to go to Swoopes Station, where it was reported the enemy had stored supplies of war. This expedition found immense quantities of commissary, quartermaster's, and ordnance stores, which it destroyed. The main column, the Third Division in advance, moved toward Waynesborough, where the enemy was found, strongly posted behind barricades and rifle pits. Gen. Custer, after engaging the enemy's artillery with his own for a short time, moved three regiments, under direction of Col. Whitaker, First Connecticut, to the left flank and rear of the enemy and routed him, with the loss of but 3 or 4 men to our command, capturing over 1,000 prisoners, the enemy's artillery and wagon train, containing all the wardrobe, papers, etc., of the officers of Early's depleted army. This event opened the roads for unresisted advance on the James River and all the roads and means of supply north of Richmond. All the captures which could not be carried away were destroyed. The prisoners and some few pieces of artillery were ordered back to Winchester, under a mounted guard of about 1,500 mounted and dismounted men, under Col. Thompson, First New Hampshire Cavalry.

"Gen. Custer, in a report dated March 20, 1865, and printed on pages 501 to 504, same volume, stated as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS THIRD CAVALRY DIVISION,

"MIDDLE MILITARY DIVISION,

"White House, Va., March 20, 1865.

"I have the honor to submit the following report of the operations of my command since February 27, 1865. * * * On the 2d we moved to Staunton, where the command was halted for a short interval. In accordance with verbal orders received from the major general commanding the expedition, I then marched toward Waynesborough. * * * Our march was necessarily slow. Upon reaching Fishersville, 6 miles from Staunton, our advance struck the enemy's pickets and drove them in the direction of Waynesborough. Upon arriving at the latter point we found the enemy in force, posted behind a formidable line of earthworks. * * * A careful reconnaissance along his entire line convinced me that the enemy had a heavy force of infantry behind his work, while 10 pieces of artillery were in position and completely covered his front. But one point seemed favorable for attack. The enemy's left flank, instead of resting on South River, was thrown well forward, leaving a short gap between his left and the river. The approach to this point could be made under cover of the woods. I directed Lieut. Col. Whitaker, of my staff, to conduct three regiments of Pennington's brigade to our extreme right. Selecting three regiments armed with Spencer carbines, they were moved, dismounted under cover of the woods, to the point previously indicated, where they were held in readiness to charge the enemy's left. * * * With reference to the conduct of the officers and men of my command throughout the entire expedition, both when engaged with the enemy and while on the march, I have nothing but words of the highest praise and commendation to offer. As a special report will be made, making mention of those who are particularly deserving and meritorious, none of the many instances of personal gallantry and merit as displayed on the late expedition are mentioned in this report.

"NORWICH, CONN., April 29, 1865.

"SIR: I would respectfully recommend Col. E. W. Whitaker, of the First Connecticut Cavalry, for promotion to the rank of brevet brigadier general. He enlisted as a private in the first regiment raised in this State, served out his three months, reenlisted, and has worked his way to his present position by sheer merit. He is well educated, thoroughly correct in his habits, and of excellent character. As an officer he is bold and dashing without rashness; in a word, an accomplished soldier.

"Mr. Secretary STANTON.

"On May 19, 1865, Whitaker was appointed brigadier general of Volunteers, by brevet, apparently upon the recommendation of Gen. Sheridan of April 19, 1865, as set forth hereinbefore, and he was notified of the appointment in a letter as follows:

"WAR DEPARTMENT,

Should the Senate at their next session advise and consent thereto, you will be commissioned accordingly.

"Immediately on receipt hereof please to communicate to this department, through The Adjutant General's Office, your acceptance or nonacceptance of said appointment, and with your letter of acceptance return to The Adjutant General of the Army the oath herewith inclosed, properly filled up, subscribed, and attested, reporting at the same time your age, residence when appointed, and the State in which you were born.

"Hartford, Conn., July 28, 1865.

"Lieut. Col. C. C. GILBERT,

"Chief Mustering Officer, State of Connecticut.

"COLONEL: I have the honor to report to you, in compliance with a paragraph from a Special Order No. 175, dated July 20, 1865, from headquarters, Quartermasters Department of Washington, which grants me a leave of absence for 10 days. At the expiration of the 10 days, which is day after to-morrow, the 30th instant, it was expected that the First Connecticut Cavalry would have arrived here for muster out. That regiment is still detained on duty, from which it may be relieved any day.

"I would respectfully request orders or instructions at your earliest convenience.

"I am, Colonel, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"E. W. WHITAKER,

"Brevet Brigadier General,

"Lieutenant Colonel First Connecticut Cavalry.

"The letter of July 28, 1865, was duly received at the office of the chief mustering officer for Connecticut. Nothing has been found of record to show what action, if any, was taken thereon, but, as recited hereinafter, it appears that Whitaker remained in the State until the arrival there of the First Connecticut Cavalry.

"In a letter dated at Ashford, Conn., August 3, 1865, Whitaker reported to the War Department for orders, and on August 19, 1865, he was advised that as his regiment had been mustered out of service he should apply to the chief mustering officer for the State for his discharge papers.

"The regiment was mustered out of the military service of the United States August 2, 1865, at Washington, D. C. The muster-out roll of the field and staff accounts for Whitaker at the time as absent from the regiment with leave, but, nevertheless, under the terms of orders then in force, he was honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on that date by reason of the muster out of the regiment, and information furnished by the Treasury Department shows that he was finally paid on the muster-out roll mentioned at New Haven, Conn., August 17, 1865.

"On August 22, 1865, an order was issued from the War Department, pertinent extracts from which are as follows:

"[General Orders, No. 133.]

"WAR DEPARTMENT,

"ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,

"By order of the Secretary of War:

"E. D. TOWNSEND,

"Assistant Adjutant General.

"The nomination of the officer as brevet brigadier general of Volunteers was presented to the United States Senate for consideration; was confirmed by that body on March 12, 1866, and thereupon the usual commission was issued on April 9, 1866, entries appearing therein showing that the appointment was to date from March 13, 1865, and was granted 'for gallantry and uniform good conduct.' The commission was sent to the governor of Connecticut May 12, 1866, for delivery to the officer.

"Gen. Whitaker alleges that he participated in 82 different engagements of the Civil War, and has submitted to this department a list of such engagements, a few less in number, but it is impossible to ascertain from the records in the department whether or not he participated in all of those engagements, because the official records do not, as a rule, show all the engagements in which an officer or enlisted man participated, and no such complete data have been found of record in the case of this officer. When specifically mentioned in connection with any particular engagement, such mention is, of course, evidence of participation, but as the records pertaining to military services in that war were usually made out monthly or bimonthly and do not show engagements in which individuals took part, the department has no means of obtaining definite information regarding individual participation in engagements, even though the organization took part therein, unless the individual is specifically mentioned in connection therewith, or unless it should happen that the organization engaged in some action on the very date of the monthly or bimonthly record, in which event the presence of a man with the organization on that date would indicate participation. Then the fact that an organization engaged in certain battles, coupled with the additional fact that there is nothing in the records to show that the officer or enlisted man was absent at the time, is also an indication of individual participation, although not conclusive.

"Following is a list of engagements submitted to this department by Gen. Whitaker in which he alleges that he took part. Opposite each engagement will be found the letter A, B, C, or D; the letter A indicating that the officer is mentioned specifically as having participated in that engagement; the letter B indicating that, by reason of his stations or duties, he probably participated in that engagement; the letter C indicating that nothing has been found of record in this department showing or tending to show that he was a participant in that engagement; and the letter D indicating that no record has been found in the War Department of any engagement at the time and place mentioned.

"Secretary of War.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith lists of recommendations for company officers of Infantry and Cavalry.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"U. S. GRANT, General.

"Accompanying the letter of October 13, 1866, was a list bearing the name of E. W. Whitaker, with the recommendation that he be appointed captain of Cavalry.

"Again, on October 17, 1866, Gen. Grant addressed the Secretary of War as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES,
"Washington, October 17, 1866.

"Hon. E. M. STANTON,
"Secretary of War.

"SIR: In view of the fact that the Seventh Regiment of Cavalry is already nearly full and yet is almost without company officers, that the men will desert rapidly unless company officers are appointed, and that the regiment is needed at once for service against the Indians, I would urgently recommend that the company officers be appointed without delay. I submit a special list of recommendations for company officers of this regiment herewith.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"U. S. GRANT, General.

"In the list accompanying the letter Whitaker was once more recommended for appointment as captain of Cavalry.

"The letter of October 17, 1866, was referred to the President by the Secretary of War on October 18, 1866, and the recommendations made therein were approved by the President on the same day.

"Thereupon a notification of appointment was prepared, as follows:

"WAR DEPARTMENT,
"Washington, October 18, 1866.

"SIR: You are hereby informed that the President of the United States has appointed you captain in the Seventh Regiment of Cavalry, in the service of the United States, to rank as such from the 28th day of July, 1866. Should the Senate at their next session advise and consent thereto, you will be commissioned accordingly.

"Immediately on receipt hereof please to communicate to this department, through The Adjutant General's Office, your acceptance or nonacceptance of said appointment, and, with your letter of acceptance, return to The Adjutant General of the Army the oath herewith inclosed, properly filled up, subscribed, and attested, reporting at the same time your age, residence when appointed, and the State in which you were born.

"You will report for examination to the board convened to meet in this city on the 24th instant, and of which Bvt. Maj. Gen. David Hunter, colonel, United States Army, is president; and so soon as notified by the president of the examining board that you have passed a satisfactory examination you will proceed without delay to join your regiment at Fort Riley, Kans.

"EDWIN M. STANTON,
"Secretary of War.

"Capt. E. W. WHITAKER,
"Seventh Regiment United States Cavalry,
"Hartford, Conn.

"The notice of his appointment was sent addressed to Gen. Whitaker, at Hartford, Conn., November 6, 1866. No response having been received from him, on April 27, 1867, a communication was on that date addressed to the postmaster at Hartford, Conn., by this department, in which a statement was requested showing whether the appointment had been delivered to Gen. Whitaker or remained in the post office uncalled for. In response the postmaster informed this department that Gen. Whitaker was then a resident of Hartford, and with the Connecticut General Life Insurance Co., and that without doubt his letters would be placed in the drawer of that company. It does not appear from the records that he accepted or acknowledged the receipt of the appointment, or that he appeared before the board for examination, or that he declined it in any manner other than the declination that was presumed by his failure to acknowledge the receipt of it.

"The matter was presented to the Secretary of War by The Adjutant General of the Army in a communication of which the following is a pertinent extract:

* * * * * * *

"'List of full appointments issued prior to December 1, 1866, which have not been accepted, although every endeavor has been made to ascertain the addresses of the appointees. Agreeably to the orders of the Secretary of War, these persons were also notified of their appointment through the press March 8, 1867, and that if not accepted on or before May 20 the appointments would be canceled.

"'Name: 7. Whitaker, E. W.

"'Appointment: Captain, Seventh Cavalry.

"'Recommended by: Gen. Grant on Army record; no residence stated.

* * * * * * *

"'Respectfully submitted to the Secretary of War with the recommendation that the appointments of the above-named persons be canceled.

"'J. C. KELTON,
"'Assistant Adjutant General.'

"The recommendation was approved, as indicated by indorsements appearing on the communication, as follows:

"'The recommendation of The Adjutant General is approved and submitted to the President, with the recommendation that the appointments be canceled for want of acceptance in due time, and that other applicants be appointed in their stead.

"'EDWIN M. STANTON,
"'Secretary of War.

"'Approved:
"'ANDREW JOHNSON.'

"On June 20, 1867, the appointment of Gen. Whitaker, as set forth in the letter of October 18, 1866, hereinbefore, was canceled.

"With regard to the statement in the accompanying bill to the effect that Gen. Whitaker 'declined to accept an appointment issued to him as captain in the Seventh Regiment, United States Cavalry,' because of disability incurred in the last engagement in which he participated, it should be remarked that nothing has been found in the official records of the War Department showing or tending to show that he incurred any disability whatever in the engagement referred to or that he was under treatment for any wound, injury, or disease, other than in the Seminary General Hospital in the months of July and August, 1863, as set forth hereinbefore.

"In a letter addressed to President Grant on July 12, 1876, Gen. Whitaker solicited an appointment in the Regular Army. The letter, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Secretary of War for consideration, and it appears from the records that on July 26, 1876, Gen. Whitaker was advised that there was no law under which he could be appointed as requested.

"On July 12, 1898, Gen. Whitaker submitted his name to the President for an appointment as additional paymaster of Volunteers, but his application for the appointment desired was not favorably considered, because all vacancies in the Paymaster's Department had been filled.

"In the year 1895 application was made for the award of a medal of honor to Gen. Whitaker for gallantry at Reams Station, Va., in June, 1864. In connection with the application documents were submitted of which the following are copies:

"STOCKFORD, WILMINGTON, DEL.,
"February 27, 1895.

"JAS. R. DURHAM, Esq.,

"DEAR SIR: Absence from home has prevented an earlier acknowledgment of your favor of February 24.

"I note with regret that my letter in regard to Gen. E. W. Whitaker's distinguished service in cutting his way through from Reams Station to headquarters near Petersburg with dispatches for Gen. Meade has been mislaid or lost, and my regret is all the keener as I find I failed to keep a copy of the letter in question.

"I now beg to replace it by what follows:

"E. W. Whitaker, then a captain of the First Connecticut Cavalry, served on my staff as an aid-de-camp, while I was commanding the Third Division, Cavalry Corps, Army of the Potomac, and at all times and upon many occasions showed himself to be a very able and conspicuously gallant officer, but he rendered peculiarly valuable and courageous service in carrying dispatches through the enemy's lines from me to Gen. Meade.

"As the official records will show, the command, after destroying the railroads between Petersburg and the Roanoke River and inflicting great injury upon the Confederate cause, had got back to the immediate vicinity of Reams Station, where it found itself confronted by a strong force of rebel cavalry and infantry. On arriving on the field in the early morning a reconnoissance of the enemy's lines convinced me that we should have to cut and run for it unless Gen. Meade should speedily send a relieving force to open the road for us, but inasmuch as Gen. Meade could have no means of knowing the perils which surrounded us, it was necessary for me to open communication with him. Headquarters were not over 5 miles away, but a strong force of veteran Confederate infantry lay straight across the way and was supported by Fitzhugh Lee's cavalry. Their position was a strong one, and the oldest cavalrymen regarded it as impregnable for our jaded force. Upon indicating my desire to get information through to Gen. Meade, Capt. Whitaker volunteered to take it, and his offer of services was accepted. A single troop of cavalry was selected to escort him, and as soon as the necessary dispatch could be written he set out upon his perilous mission, and within an hour he had cut his way through the Confederate lines and delivered his dispatch at Army headquarters. The details of his exploit will be found in the official records, but no one except himself and those who saw him ride so gallantly into and through the rebel lines can properly appreciate the dangers he ran or the value of the services rendered by him. It is true that Gen. Meade did not succeed in getting any part of his force to Reams Station till after noon, and after we had retired, but that was no fault of Capt. Whitaker's. He did his whole duty with rare skill, dash, and courage and I trust may be rewarded by the medal of honor and the proper acknowledgment of his distinguished services upon that occasion.

"Yours, very respectfully, "JAMES H. WILSON,
"Late Major General, Volunteers.

"The application was considered favorably and on March 22, 1898, a medal of honor was awarded to Gen. Whitaker for most distinguished gallantry in action at Reams Station, Va., June 29, 1864, the action taken being based upon a decision of the Secretary of War, as follows:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,

"By direction of the President a medal of honor is presented to Gen. Edward W. Whitaker.

"At Reams Station, Va., June 29, 1864, this officer, then captain, First Connecticut Volunteer Cavalry, in command of a troop, hearing of an expressed wish of the general in command to get information to Gen. Meade through the line of the enemy, volunteered to carry the dispatches. In the most distinguished manner he forced his way through an infantry division of the enemy and delivered the dispatches to Gen. Meade, but lost half his escort in the desperate ride.

[Senate Report No. 281, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

"The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2646) for the relief of Edward W. Whitaker, have considered the same and report it back to the Senate with the recommendation that it do pass.

"The records of the War Department show that Gen. Whitaker enlisted as a private April 19, 1861, in Company A, First Connecticut Infantry Volunteers, on President Lincoln's first call for volunteers, and served in the field during the war from Bull Run to Appomattox, receiving promotion through every grade to lieutenant colonel for gallantry in action on recommendations of his commanding officers, and then was specially brevetted brigadier general of United States Volunteers over many senior officers for skill and gallantry displayed in the three last and decisive battles that ended the war, he having participated in 82 engagements and being so disabled in the last that he declined to accept an appointment issued to him as captain in the Seventh Regiment United States Cavalry, on which he could have been retired as lieutenant colonel, the rank held when disabled.

"Gen. Whitaker was given a hearing on March 3, 1916, before a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs in connection with a similar bill (S. 2517) which passed the Senate in the Sixty-fourth Congress. An extract from the report of that hearing is printed herewith:

"'The CHAIRMAN. Now, Gen. Whitaker, please state, so the stenographer can get it down, the history of your service, making it as condensed as possible and giving the reasons why you ask to have this bill passed.

"'Gen. WHITAKER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I wish to say that the outline of my services and the claims that I present are briefly recited in Senator BRANDEGEE's bill, S. 2517. My military history is briefly recited there, and the grounds on which I feel that special legislation would be justified in this case. You have right there, supporting it, a full detailed military history from the War Department of about 50 pages. That recites my record all the way from the Battle of Bull Run to Appomattox. It also recites the fact that at the close of the war I was appointed a captain in the Seventh United States Cavalry, an appointment I declined on account of the fact that my disabilities, incurred in the last battles of the war, would have immediately resulted in my being ordered before a medical examining board and my being retired on account of my disabilities.

"'I was unfitted for the service. Had I been retired under the law at that time I would have been retired as a lieutenant colonel, but I was somehow too proud to accept that. I said, "I have my hands and I can get my living, and therefore I will not be a pensioner on the rolls of the Government when the Treasury is so depleted on account of the terrible cost of the great war we have just passed through." Out of my foolish pride, I concede now, I declined that appointment. I would have been all these long years on the retired list, competing with men that could not beat me every time. Besides, I did not feel that I was so seriously disabled; if I had had an arm off I probably should have accepted the appointment.

"'I have been induced, however, during the last 12 years by my friends, on account of my growing disabilities, to ask to be put on the retired list. My Congressman, Charles A. Russell, 12 or 15 years ago introduced a bill to retire me as captain, in view of the fact I had been once appointed captain. He thought at first he had only to go to the White House, to the President, and he would at once reappoint me, but he soon learned he could not do so. For 12 years I have been hoping to be retired. During those years the volunteer officers have organized an association to secure a general legislative retirement bill. They organized that after I had tried. I had only tried after a few of my Confederate friends were put on the list. Men who had fought for four years against me in the field were retired, and many volunteer Union officers. My old captain, Joseph R. Hawley, who became a general, was put on the retired list, and Gen. Osterhaus, both volunteers. They were civilians who were put on the retired list in their old age.

"'I have been rather negligent about pressing my bill, for the reason I did not have the means to employ a lawyer, and I had hoped that during these long years perhaps those volunteer officers would secure the passage of the general bill and I would be taken care of there. But recently I have been assured that there is no prospect whatever of a general retirement bill being passed, by reason of the fact that it would involve a large sum of money, and that it might provide for men who are amply able to subsist without a pension or retired pay from the Government.

"'My friends have urged me to press my individual bill, and I have plenty of friends in the Senate; and, having their assurance that there would be no opposition to a meritorious individual bill, I have had the audacity to ask for a special hearing. Last year I was denied even a five-minute hearing by a Senator who is not now on the committee. He said, "Drop it. Support the general bill; we will put the general bill through." It failed. I do not want to say anything further to go into the report, and I will therefore state that I leave the whole matter in your hands, gentlemen.

"'I ought to add, however, that I am in that condition of health and forced in my occupation to expose myself so that I will probably not survive another year. I have serious bronchial trouble. I am occupying a position which is menial and degrading. I am watching the violations of the smoke law in the District of Columbia here, so as to get pure air to breathe. That necessitates my exposure in blizzards like this—and I only got leave of absence for to-day so as to come here—on the tops of high buildings, where I can not protect myself with the most heavy clothing in the world. I have to stand still and get no exercise. Each year I get worse and worse with my bronchial trouble, and unless I get some relief I shall have to go to some soldiers' home or be "planted" in Arlington. That is the way it looks now. I leave the matter with you.

"'Senator MYERS. What would be your pay if you were retired as lieutenant colonel?

"'Gen. WHITAKER. I have been asked that repeatedly, and I have told everybody that I have never thought of asking the question or looking it up. I do not know what the retired pay of a lieutenant colonel is. It is cut down considerably from what the Regulars get in the service; they have a lot of perquisites. I can not tell you the retired pay of a lieutenant colonel to save my life.

"'The CHAIRMAN. Do you get a pension now?

"'Gen. WHITAKER. Yes. I have $30 a month, the rating for total disability incurred when holding the rank of lieutenant colonel. I should have told you that when I was examined in the Pension Bureau the examiners found me three times totally disabled. If I could have received the aggregate pension for all my disabilities it would have amounted to $104 a month. The ratings added together would have amounted to that much, but no rate could legally be put above $30. I am rated at only $30.

"'The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of any other instances where volunteers who served in the Army when the war was over and their services were ended were retired on officers' pay?

"'Gen. WHITAKER. Plenty of them everywhere.

"'The CHAIRMAN. Without being reappointed, or something of that sort?

"'Gen. WHITAKER. No; not without being reappointed. They were appointed—many of my own friends were appointed the same as I was. I recollect Capt. Tyler, who was competing in business with me in Washington. He had his arm off. I did not even ask for a pension until in the eighties, when I broke down in business. I was too proud to ask for a pension prior to that.

"'The CHAIRMAN. When did your service terminate?

"'Gen. WHITAKER. I was mustered out August 16, 1865, and enlisted April 15, 1861. I was four years and four months in the service, and there is not a scratch of a pen against me. I was never reprimanded and never absent without leave. I have as perfect a military record as can be produced.

"'The CHAIRMAN. If you had accepted the appointment as captain you could have retired later while in the service as captain, and then you would have been retired on that basis——

"'Gen. WHITAKER. I would have been retired as a lieutenant colonel promptly, on medical examination, under the law at that time, by reason of the fact that I was disabled while ranking as lieutenant colonel.

"'The CHAIRMAN. I thought you were ranking as captain?

"'Gen. WHITAKER. No; the law will tell you that a retired Army officer, retired for disabilities incurred in the service, would be retired at the rank he held when disabled. I was disabled as a lieutenant colonel. Many have said to me, "You should be retired as a general." But no; I was not appointed as a general (brigadier by brevet) until after Appomattox. Then I was mustered out, August 16, 1865, as a brevet brigadier general. I could not have been retired as a general under the law; I could only have been retired as a lieutenant colonel, the rank I held at the time I was disabled at Five Forks.

"'Senator MYERS. What is your age?

"Gen. WHITAKER. I was 19 when I enlisted. I will be 75 in June next.

"'The CHAIRMAN. I believe that is all, General.

"'Gen. WHITAKER. I am very much obliged to you, gentlemen.'"

"The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 861) for the relief of Edward W. Whitaker, having considered the same, report thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass with the following amendments:

"In line 15, page 1, strike out the words 'after the date of the passage of this act' after the word 'States' and insert 'thereafter.'

"In line 2, page 2, strike out 'passage of this act' and insert 'date of his commission as a retired officer.'

"LETTER FROM THE ASSISTANT CLERK OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS TRANSMITTING A CERTIFIED COPY OF THE FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSION FILED IN THE CASE OF EDWARD W. WHITAKER AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

"COURT OF CLAIMS,
"Washington, May 18, 1914.

"Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court, I transmit herewith a certified copy of the findings of fact and conculsions filed in the aforesaid cause, which case was referred to this court by resolution of the House of Representatives June 22, 1912, under the act of March 3, 1911, known as the Judicial Code.

"I am, very respectfully, yours,

"JOHN RANDOLPH,
"Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

[Court of Claims. Congressional, 15837–295. Edward W. Whitaker v. The United States.]

"STATEMENT OF CASE.

"This is a claim for bounty for military service during the Civil War, and in the petition filed June 21, 1913, petitioner alleges as follows:

"That he is a citizen of the United States resident in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and that he has a claim against the United States which arises as follows:

"That he enlisted April 15, 1861, as private, Company A, First Connecticut Infantry, to serve three months, and was mustered out July 31, 1861; he again enlisted in Company B, Second New York Cavalry, August 21, 1861, for a term of three years; promoted second lieutenant, November 16, 1862; first lieutenant, March 17, 1863; captain, January 30, 1864; transferred to First Connecticut Cavalry and promoted major, September 14, 1864; promoted lieutenant colonel, January 17, 1865; and honorably discharged, August 2, 1865, by reason of end of the war.

"That the act of July 22, 1861, entitled 'An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing laws and protecting public property,' provides (12 Stat., 268):

"'Every volunteer noncommissioned officer, private, musician, and artificer who enters the service of the United States under this act shall be paid * * * when honorably discharged * * * if he shall have served for a period of two years, or during the war, if sooner ended, the sum of $100."

"And the act of July 28, 1866 (14 Stat., 310), provides:

"'That each and every soldier who enlisted into the Army of the United States after the 19th day of April, 1861, for a period of not less than three years, and having served the time of his enlistment, has been honorably discharged, and who has recieved or who is entitled to receive from the United States under existing laws a bounty of $100 and no more, and any such soldier enlisted for not less than three years who has been honorably discharged on account of wounds received in the line of duty, and the widow, minor children, or parents, in the order named, of any such soldier who died in the service of the United States or of disease or wounds contracted while in the service and in the line of duty, shall be paid the additional bounty of $100 hereby authorized.'

"That he presented his claim for bounty under these laws to proper accounting officers of the Treasury, and it was disallowed on the ground that he was discharged for promotion prior to a service of two years.

"That believing this decision to be unfair, he appealed to Congress for relief, and a bill, H. R. 23375, second session, Sixty-second Congress, was referred to this court on June 22, 1912, by a resolution of the House of Representatives, said bill, so far as it relates to his case, reading as follows:

"'SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to each of the following persons named in this section, or, if deceased, to the party entitled thereto, the sum of $400, or so much thereof as may be necessary, being for unpaid balance of bounty for military service during the Civil War, namely: * * * Edward W. Whitaker, * * *.'

"The case was brought to a hearing on its merits on the 30th day of March, 1914. C. D. Pennebaker, Esq., appeared for the claimant and the Attorney General, by B. W. Andrews, Esq., his assistant and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

"The court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, makes the following

"FINDINGS OF FACT.

"I. The claimant, Edward W. Whitaker, was enrolled in the military service of the United States on April 19, 1861, for three months, in Company A, First Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, and was mustered out with his company July 31, 1861.

"He was again enrolled in Company D, Second New York Cavalry, August 21, 1861, for three years; was promoted to be second lieutenant November 16, 1862, and resigned as captain April 29, 1864.

"II. Said claimant filed a claim for bounty with the accounting officers of the Treasury under the act of July 22, 1861 (12 Stat., 269), and July 28, 1866 (14 Stat., 322), and the same was disallowed April 14, 1909, for the following reasons:

"'For his first service as an enlisted man there is no law authorizing the payment of bounty. As of his second service, he was enrolled as an enlisted man after July 21, 1861, and discharged for promotion prior to two years' service, hence no bounty due.'

"CONCLUSION.

"Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court concludes that the claim is neither a legal nor an equitable one against the United States.

"BY THE COURT.

"JOHN RANDOLPH,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LENROOT. This matter was not even presented to the committee. It is bad policy to place matters of this kind upon an appropriation bill, especially when the committee has not had opportunity to consider it. I therefore feel constrained to make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The matter was not strictly formally presented to the committee, I admit. I did, however, consult with the chairman of the committee and the Senator having the bill in charge and asked them if they would be willing to let it go to conference and see if the House conferees would not agree to it, but not to press it unduly if the House would not agree to it.

One of my predecessors in the Senate, Senator Hawley, once had the amendment placed upon a similar appropriation bill in order to get it through. This gentleman was an intimate friend of Gen. Hawley. He has only a year or so yet to live. I would not ask that it be considered as an amendment to the pending bill if there was any prospect of its getting attention in the House in the ordinary manner. I hope, inasmuch as the chairman of the committee and the Senator in charge of the bill have no objection to it, that the Senator from Wisconsin will not feel constrained to insist upon his point of order.

Mr. LENROOT. As a member of the subcommittee I will say that there was one other very similar matter brought to the attention of the committee and the committee declined to favor the amendment in that case. I do think it would be a discrimination against others to permit it in this case; and if it be permitted in this case there are no doubt a dozen equally meritorious propositions now pending before the Committee on Military Affairs that would have equal claim to go upon the bill. I shall, therefore, insist upon the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, and Mr. MCKELLAR conferees on the part of the Senate.

CON MURPHY.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 3119) for the relief of Con Murphy. It will lead to no debate; or if so, I shall not press it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$2,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000 to Con Murphy, for personal injuries sustained by him while in the performance of his duty as janitor in the Custodian Service, Federal building, Cheyenne, Wyo.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUITS IN ADMIRALTY—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There is a conference report on the table which has been acted upon by the House, and I ask that it may be considered. I think it will take but a moment. It is the conference report on Senate bill 3076, authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdictions, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the conference report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3076) authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdictions, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the House amendment insert the following:

"That no vessel owned by the United States or by any corporation in which the United States or its representatives shall own the entire outstanding capital stock or in the possession of the United States or of such corporation or operated by or for the United States or such corporation, and no cargo owned or possessed by the United States or by such corporation, shall hereafter, in view of the provision herein made for a libel in personam, be subject to arrest or seizure by judicial process in the United States or its possessions: Provided, That this act shall not apply to the Panama Railroad Co.

"SEC. 2. That in cases where if such vessel were privately owned or operated, or if such cargo were privately owned and possessed, a proceeding in admiralty could be maintained at the time of the commencement of the action herein provided for, a libel in personam may be brought against the United States or against such corporation, as the case may be, provided that such vessel is employed as a merchant vessel or is a tugboat operated by such corporation. Such suits shall be brought in the district court of the United States for the district in which the parties so suing, or any of them, reside or have their principal place of business in the United States, or in which the vessel or cargo charged with liability is found. The libelant shall forthwith serve a copy of his libel on the United States attorney for such district and mail a copy thereof by registered mail to the Attorney General of the United States, and shall file a sworn return of such service and mailing. Such service and mailing shall constitute valid service on the United States and such corporation. In case the United States or such corporation shall file a libel in rem or in personam in any district, a cross-libel in personam may be filed or a set-off claimed against the United States or such corporation with the same force and effect as if the libel had been filed by a private party. Upon application of either party the cause may, in the discretion of the court, be transferred to any other district court of the United States.

"SEC. 3. That such suits shall proceed and shall be heard and determined according to the principles of law and to the rules of practice obtaining in like cases between private parties. A decree against the United States or such corporation may include costs of suit, and when the decree is for a money judgment, interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until satisfied, or at any higher rate which shall be stipulated in any contract upon which such decree shall be based. Interest shall run as ordered by the court. Decrees shall be subject to appeal and revision as now provided in other cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. If the libelant so elects in his libel the suit may proceed in accordance with the principles of libels in rem wherever it shall appear that had the vessel or cargo been privately owned and possessed a libel in rem might have been maintained. Election so to proceed shall not preclude the libelant in any proper case from seeking relief in personam in the same suit. Neither the United States nor such corporation shall be required to give any bond or admiralty stipulation on any proceeding brought hereunder. Any such bond or stipulation heretofore given in admiralty causes by the United States, the United States Shipping Board, or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, shall become void and be surrendered and canceled upon the filing of a suggestion by the Attorney General or other duly authorized law officer that the United States is interested in such cause, and assumes liability to satisfy any decree included within said bond or stipulation, and thereafter any such decree shall be paid as provided in section 8 of this act.

"SEC. 4. That if a privately owned vessel not in the possession of the United States or of such corporation is arrested or attached upon any cause of action arising or alleged to have arisen from previous possession, ownership, or operation of such vessel by the United States or by such corporation, such vessel shall be released without bond or stipulation therefor upon the suggestion by the United States, through its Attorney General or other duly authorized law officer, that it is interested in such cause, desires such release, and assumes the liability for the satisfaction of any decree obtained by the libelant in such cause, and thereafter such cause shall proceed against the United States in accordance with the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 5. That suits as herein authorized may be brought only on causes of action arising since April 6, 1917, provided that suits based on causes of action arising prior to the taking effect of this act shall be brought within one year after this act goes into effect; and all other suits hereunder shall be brought within two years after the cause of action arises.

"SEC. 6. That the United States or such corporation shall be entitled to the benefits of all exemptions and of all limitations of liability accorded by law to the owners, charterers, operators, or agents of vessels.

"SEC. 7. That if any vessel or cargo within the purview of sections 1 and 4 of this act is arrested, attached, or otherwise seized by process of any court in any country other than the United States, or if any suit is brought therein against the master of any such vessel for any cause of action arising from, or in connection with, the possession, operation, or ownership of any such vessel, or the possession, carriage, or ownership of any such cargo, the Secretary of State of the United States in his discretion, upon the request of the Attorney General of the United States, or any other officer duly authorized by him, may direct the United States consul residing at or nearest the place at which such action may have been commenced to claim such vessel or cargo as immune from such arrest, attachment, or other seizure, and to execute an agreement, undertaking, bond, or stipulation for and on behalf of the United States, or the United States Shipping Board, or such corporation as by said court required, for the release of such vessel or cargo, and for the prosecution of any appeal; or may, in the event of such suits against the master of any such vessel, direct said United States consul to enter the appearance of the United States, or of the United States Shipping Board, or of such corporation, and to pledge the credit thereof to the payment of any judgment and cost that may be entered in such suit. The Attorney General is hereby vested with power and authority to arrange with any bank, surety company, person, firm, or corporation in the United States, its Territories and possessions, or in any foreign country, to execute any such aforesaid bond or stipulation as surety or stipulator thereon, and to pledge the credit of the United States to the indemnification of such surety or stipulator as may be required to secure the execution of such bond or stipulation. The presentation of a copy of the judgment roll in any such suit, certified by the clerk of the court and authenticated by the certificate and seal of the United States consul claiming such vessel or cargo, or his successor, and by the certificate of the Secretary of State as to the official capacity of such consul, shall be sufficient evidence to the proper accounting officers of the United States, or of the United States Shipping Board, or of such corporation, for the allowance and payment of such judgments: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall be held to prejudice or preclude a claim of the immunity of such vessel or cargo from foreign jurisdiction in a proper case.

"SEC. 8. That any final judgment rendered in any suit herein authorized, and any final judgment within the purview of sections 4 and 7 of this act, and any arbitration award or settlement had and agreed to under the provisions of section 9 of this act, shall, upon the presentation of a duly authenticated copy thereof, be paid by the proper accounting officers of the United States out of any appropriation or insurance fund or other fund especially available therefor; otherwise there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to pay any such judgment or award or settlement.

"SEC. 9. That the Secretary of any department of the Government of the United States, or the United States Shipping Board, or the board of trustees of such corporation, having control of the possession or operation of any merchant vessel are, and each hereby is, authorized to arbitrate, compromise, or settle any claim in which suit will lie under the provisions of sections 2, 4, 7, and 10 of this act.

"SEC. 10. That the United States, and the crew of any merchant vessel owned or operated by the United States, or such corporation, shall have the right to collect and sue for salvage services rendered by such vessel and crew, and any moneys recovered therefrom by the United States for its own benefit, and not for the benefit of the crew, shall be covered into the United States Treasury to the credit of the department of the Government of the United States, or of the United States Shipping Board, or of such corporation, having control of the possession or operation of such vessel.

"SEC. 11. That all moneys recovered in any suit brought by the United States on any cause of action arising from, or in connection with, the possession, operation, or ownership of any merchant vessel, or the possession, carriage, or ownership of any cargo, shall be covered into the United States Treasury to the credit of the department of the Government of the United States, or of the United States Shipping Board, or of such aforesaid corporation, having control of the vessel or cargo with respect to which such cause of action arises, for reimbursement of the appropriation, or insurance fund, or other funds, from which the loss, damage, or compensation for which said judgment was recovered has been or will be paid.

"SEC. 12. That the Attorney General shall report to the Congress at each session thereof the suits under this act in which final judgment shall have been rendered for or against the United States and such aforesaid corporation, and the Secretary of any department of the Government of the United States, and the United States Shipping Board, and the board of trustees of any such aforesaid corporation, shall likewise report the arbitration awards or settlements of claims which shall have been agreed to since the previous session, and in which the time to appeal shall have expired or have been waived.

"SEC. 13. That the provisions of all other acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed."

And the House agree to the same.

The report was agreed to.

PRINTING OF MATTER IN CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to give notice at this time that, beginning to-morrow morning, I shall object to any outside matter being printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on request of Senators, with the exception of resolutions from State legislatures or city councils. I want Senators to know now that there will be no discrimination, but it will apply to every Senator. The only way Senators will be allowed to get any such matter in the RECORD from now on will be by a vote of the Senate. I felt that I should give the notice this morning.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator what his objection will cover? I did not hear it clearly.

Mr. SMOOT. My objection will cover everything with the exception of resolutions from the legislature of a State or the city council of a city, I will say to the Senator.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to reservation No. 4.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the purpose of the reservation now under consideration by the Senate is to limit controversies which come under consideration or investigation by the league. It is quite evident that it was not the purpose of those framing the covenant that purely domestic questions should fall within the jurisdiction of either the council or the assembly, and a method was provided by which the question should be determined, when the objection was raised that a question was domestic in character, that the council should determine whether it was or was not.

Very serious objection was made on Thursday last by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the all-embracing provisions of the covenant in relation to questions which might be submitted for investigation or inquiry by the council or the assembly. I thought it quite pertinent and appropriate to call the attention of the Senate—and of the country, for that matter—to the fact that we have already traveled a long way in the direction of submitting controversies either to arbitration or to investigation. The Senator from Missouri felt very much concerned for the future of our country by reason of these provisions, under which questions generally were thus to be submitted for investigation, apparently overlooking entirely the fact that we have already gone almost as far in that direction, and in some aspects and particulars even farther, by the so-called Bryan treaties, which were adopted by the practically unanimous vote of the Senate away back in the year 1914, nearly six years ago.

I regret that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is not here this morning. I should like to have his attention if he were here to article 1 of the so-called Bryan treaties. I read from the treaty between the United States and the Netherlands, ratified by the Senate on the 13th day of August, 1914. It reads as follows:

The high contracting parties agree that all disputes between them—

All disputes between them—

of any nature whatsoever, to the settlement of which previous arbitration treaties or agreements do not apply in their terms or are not applied in fact, shall, when diplomatic methods of adjustment have failed, be referred for investigation and report to a permanent international commission, to be constituted in the manner prescribed in the next succeeding article.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Senator from Montana from what he is reading?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read from the treaty with the Netherlands, ratified by the Senate on the 13th of August, 1914, a characteristic so-called Bryan treaty.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that this provides for the submission of every question. It would not even exclude those that are distinctively domestic in character, if, indeed, a dispute could arise over a purely domestic matter.

I wish to call attention to the fact that this international commission, to which all of these disputes of every character are relegated, exercises practically the same power as that reposed in the council or in the assembly of the league. It investigates, it inquires, and it makes a report. That is all the council is entitled to do under the provisions of article 15 of the covenant. Whenever there is a division, if any one voice should be raised against it, the council can do nothing more than the international commission can do under the Bryan treaties, namely, to investigate and report. But if the council shall be entirely unanimous or in case an appeal should be taken to the assembly and the assembly is unanimous and a majority of the other members of the league agree, still nothing can be done by the council. Its judgment, its report, is no more enforceable than is the report of the international commission provided for in the Bryan treaties, and the only difference in the effect is that under article 15 the nation against which the report goes agrees that it will not go to war to enforce its claim involved in the dispute.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator has evidently made a study of this question. I should like to inquire what is the effect of the report and the purpose of the report? Is it merely to create a public sentiment among the nations in favor of one proposition or another?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is all. It is believed that the world will accept the judgment of the international commission as the proper solution of the dispute, and that a nation going to war contrary to the determination of the council would not have that support of world opinion that is so important in one of these great contests.

That is exactly the effect that goes with the determination of the council under the provisions of article 15. It is equally believed that the judgment of the council, whenever a matter is referred to it under the provisions of article 15, will be accepted by the world, and that it will thus act as a deterrent upon both of the parties interested, or upon as many parties as are interested, against an appeal to arms.

Mr. PHELAN. May I further interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. I was not aware that the Bryan treaties were so general in their terms as to require the submission of all questions to negotiation, and in case of failure by negotiation to report. Does the Senator think a question so confessedly domestic as the question of immigration should be submitted at all, either to negotiation or to report, when there is no disposition on the part of this Government at any time to submit to a foreign or mixed tribunal the settlement of a question of that kind?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I prefer not to be diverted from the line of argument I am now making to consider the advisability or the wisdom of the Bryan treaties.

Mr. PHELAN. I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am calling attention to the fact that we went further in the Bryan treaties, and we now have international engagements more extensive in their scope with respect to the submission of controversies to inquiry or investigation or to arbitration than the covenant which has been the subject of so much criticism.

Mr. President, not only that; not only do we by those treaties agree to submit to inquiry all controversies of every nature whatsoever, but when those treaties were under consideration the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] undertook to exclude from the operation of them any questions arising under the Monroe doctrine, and he was not able to muster a handful of Senators to the support of that contention. The proceedings of the Senate upon the so-called Bryan treaties appear never to have been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but I have before me the record of executive session for August 3, 1914, the treaty with Norway being under consideration. From that record I read as follows:

Mr. POINDEXTER proposed the following amendment:

In article 1, line 1, after the word "disputes," insert the following: "Not involving the Monroe doctrine or other question of settled national policy, or the vital interests or the national honor of either of the high contracting parties."

That would make the article read:

The high contracting parties agree that all disputes not involving the Monroe doctrine or other question of settled national policy, or the vital interests, or the national honor of the high contracting parties between them, of every nature whatsoever, to the settlement of which—

And so forth.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Merely for the purpose of clarity, I desire to suggest that the Senator from Montana referred to the treaty from which he has quoted as "the Norway treaty." Of course, that is the one of the Bryan treaties applicable to Norway?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is the treaty between the United States and Norway, and is one of the Bryan treaties.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is one of the so-called Bryan treaties?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes. I continue to read from the executive Journal:

Pending the consideration of his amendment and in response to a suggestion by Mr. POINDEXTER of the absence of a quorum, the roll was called. Fifty Senators responded to their names, revealing the presence of a quorum.

The call of the roll for the yeas and nays on Mr. POINDEXTER'S amendment was ordered, and, on the demand of that Senator, duly seconded, with the result that 10 Senators responded in the affirmative and 35 in the negative.

Those who voted in the affirmative are,

Messrs. Borah, Brady, Bristow, Fall, Gallinger, Jones, Martine of New Jersey, Page, Poindexter, and Smoot—10.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would it not be well to have the names of those who voted in the negative also read?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask, Mr. President, that the entire record on the Bryan treaties in the Executive Journal from page 508 to page 516 be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Executive Journal, Thursday, August 13 (legislative day of August 11), 1914.]

"Pursuant to the agreement of yesterday, August 12, 1914, the Senate proceeded to consider executive business at 11 o'clock a. m. (the Vice President in the chair), and, as in Committee of the Whole, continued consideration of the treaty with Norway (Ex. J., 63d Cong., 2d sess.) looking to the advancement of the cause of general peace.

"Mr. Jones suggested the absence of a quorum, and the roll being called, 50 Senators responded to their names, showing a quorum to be present.

"The treaty was read a second time and proceeded with article by article.

"The Committee on Foreign Relations having no amendments, Mr. Cummins presented the following, which, by unanimous consent, was treated as one amendment:

"Article II. In line 2, after the word 'whatsoever,' insert the following: 'wherein the facts are in controversy.'

"In line 3, after the word 'investigation,' insert the words 'of the facts'; and, in the same line, after the word 'report,' insert the word 'thereon.'

"Article III. In line 1, after the word 'adjust,' insert the word 'such.'

"In line 4, after the word 'report,' insert the words 'as to the facts.'

"After debate on his amendment, Mr. Cummins suggested the absence of a quorum. The Chair directed the calling of the roll, and 55 Senators having responded to their names, a quorum was announced to be present.

"Mr. Cummins demanded a call for the yeas and nays on his amendment, and the demand being adequately seconded, the Secretary was directed to call the roll, which was done, with the result that 13 votes were cast in the affirmative and 36 votes in the negative.

"Those who voted in the affirmative are:

"Messrs. Bristow, Clark of Wyoming, Cummins, Fall, Gallinger, Gronna, Hitchcock, Jones, Martine of New Jersey, Page, Poindexter, Smoot, and Sterling—13.

"Those who voted in the negative are:

"Messrs. Ashurst, Bankhead, Borah, Brady, Bryan, Burton, Camden, Clarke of Arkansas, Culberson, Hollis, Hughes, Johnson, Kern, Lea of Tennessee, Lee of Maryland, Lewis, Lippitt, McCumber, Nelson, O'Gorman, Overman, Perkins, Pittman, Shafroth, Sheppard, Shields, Simmons, Smith of Maryland, Stone, Swanson, Thompson, Thornton, Walsh, West, White, and Williams—36.

"Accordingly, the amendment was not agreed to.

"Mr. Thomas moved to amend by adding at the end of article 2 the following:

"'They further agree that pending such investigation and report such dispute shall remain in status quo.'

"After debate, the question being on the acceptance of Mr. Thomas's amendment, that Senator demanded the yeas and nays. The demand being seconded, the roll was called, with the result that 5 votes were cast in the affirmative and 45 in the negative.

"Those who voted in the affirmative are:

"Messrs. Clark of Wyoming, Fall, Jones, Martine of New Jersey, and Shafroth—5.

"Those who voted in the negative are:

"Messrs. Ashurst, Bankhead, Brady, Bristow, Bryan, Burton, Camden, Chamberlain, Clarke of Arkansas, Culberson, Cummins, Gallinger, Gronna, Hitchcock, Hughes, Johnson, Kern, Lee of Maryland, Lewis, Lippitt, McCumber, Nelson, O'Gorman, Overman, Page, Perkins, Poindexter, Pomerene, Ransdell, Saulsbury, Sheppard, Shields, Simmons, Smith of Maryland, Smoot, Sterling, Stone, Swanson, Thompson, Thornton, Vardaman, Walsh, West, White, and Williams—45.

"So the amendment was not agreed to.

"Mr. Cummins moved to strike out the word 'five' and insert the word 'six' in line 1, Article II; to strike out all of the same article after the word 'follows' in line 2, and to insert in lieu thereof the following: 'Three nationals of each of the high contracting parties.'

"The amendment was not agreed to.

"Mr. Poindexter proposed the following amendment:

"In Article I, line 1, after the word 'disputes,' insert the following: 'Not involving the Monroe doctrine or other question of settled national policy, or the vital interests or the national honor of either of the high contracting parties.'

"Pending the consideration of his amendment and in response to a suggestion by Mr. Poindexter of the absence of a quorum the roll was called. Fifty Senators responded to their names, revealing the presence of a quorum.

"The call of the roll for the yeas and nays on Mr. Poindexter's amendment was ordered on the demand of that Senator, duly seconded, with the result that 10 Senators responded in the affirmative and 35 in the negative.

"Those who voted in the affirmative are,

"Messrs. Borah, Brady, Bristow, Fall, Gallinger, Jones, Martine of New Jersey, Page, Poindexter, and Smoot—10.

"Those who voted in the negative are,

"Messrs. Ashurst, Bankhead, Bryan, Burton, Camden, Culberson, Hitchcock, Hollis, Hughes, Kern, Lea of Tennessee, Lee of Maryland, Lewis, Lippitt, McCumber, Nelson, O'Gorman, Overman, Perkins, Pittman, Ransdell, Shafroth, Sheppard, Shields, Simmons, Smith of Georgia, Smith of Maryland, Sterling, Stone, Swanson, Thompson, Thornton, West, White, and Williams—35.

"(Messrs. Chamberlain, Johnson, Reed, and Thomas being present and paired, the Vice President declared a quorum in attendance.)

"So the amendment was not agreed to.

"No further amendments being offered and none having been agreed to, the proceedings in Committee of the Whole were reported to the Senate.

"Thereupon Mr. Swanson submitted the following resolution of ratification:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty between the United States and Norway (Ex. J, 63d Cong., 2d sess.), looking to the advancement of the cause of general peace, signed at Washington June 24, 1914.

"Mr. Jones submitted the following amendment:

"Add at the end of the resolution the following:

"'Provided, That the Senate advises and consents to the ratification of said treaty with the understanding, to be made part of such ratification, that the treaty does not authorize the submission to or investigation by said international commission of any question which affects the admission of aliens into the United States, or the admission of aliens to the educational institutions of the several States, or the territorial integrity of the several States or of the United States, or concerning the question of the alleged indebtedness or moneyed obligation of any State of the United States, or any question which depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions, commonly described as the Monroe doctrine, or other purely governmental policy.'

"The amendment was not agreed to.

"No further amendments being presented, and the question recurring on the resolution as submitted by Mr. Swanson,

"Mr. Poindexter demanded a call of the roll for the ayes and noes. The demand was seconded, and the call being ordered, resulted in a vote of 45 yeas and 5 nays.

"Those who voted in the affirmative are,

"Messrs. Ashurst, Bankhead, Brady, Bryan, Burton, Camden, Clarke of Arkansas, Gallinger, Gronna, Hitchcock, Hughes, Johnson, Kern, Lea of Tennessee, Lee of Maryland, Lewis, Lippitt, McCumber, Martine of New Jersey, Nelson, O'Gorman, Overman, Page, Perkins, Pittman, Pomerene, Ransdell, Saulsbury, Shafroth, Sheppard, Shields, Simmons, Smith of Maryland, Smoot, Sterling, Stone, Swanson, Thompson, Thornton, Vardaman, Walsh, West, White, and Williams—44.

"Those who voted in the negative are,

"Messrs. Borah, Bristow, Fall, Jones, and Poindexter—5.

"So the resolution of ratification was agreed to.

"The Senate proceeded then, as in the Committee of the Whole, to consider the treaty with the Netherlands (Ex. P), looking to the advancement of the cause of general peace.

"The treaty was read the second time and proceeded with article by article.

"There being no amendments, the treaty was reported to the Senate.

"There still being no amendments,

"Mr. Swanson offered the following resolution of ratification:

"'Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty between the United States and the Netherlands (Ex. P, 63d Cong., 2d sess.), looking to the advancement of the cause of general peace, signed at Washington, December 18, 1913.'

"Mr. Culberson demanded the yeas and nays and the call being seconded, the Vice President ordered that the roll be called, which was done, with the result that 36 votes were cast in the affirmative and 4 in the negative.

"Those who voted in the affirmative are,

"Messrs. Ashurst, Bankhead, Brady, Bryan, Burton, Camden, Gallinger, Gronna, Hollis, Hughes, Johnson, Kern, Lea of Tennessee, Lee of Maryland, Lewis, Martine of New Jersey, Page, Perkins, Pomerene, Ransdell, Saulsbury, Shafroth, Sheppard, Simmons, Smith of Maryland Smoot, Stone, Swanson, Thomas, Thompson, Thornton, Vardaman, Walsh, West, White, and Williams—36.

"Those who voted in the negative are,

"Messrs. Clapp, Fall, Jones, and Poindexter—4.

"The call having developed the absence of a quorum, the Vice President directed that the roll be called, with the result that 50 Senators responded to their names, showing a quorum present.

"The roll call for the yeas and nays on the resolution of ratification being renewed, resulted in 48 votes in the affirmative and none in the negative.

"Those who voted in the affirmative are,

"Messrs. Bankhead, Brady, Bryan, Burton, Camden, Chamberlain, Clarke of Arkansas, Culberson, Gallinger, Gronna, Hollis, Hughes, Johnson, Kern, Lea of Tennessee, Lee of Maryland, Lewis, Lippitt, McCumber, Martine of New Jersey, Nelson, O'Gorman, Overman, Owen, Page, Perkins, Pittman, Pomerene, Ransdell, Reed, Saulsbury, Shafroth, Sheppard, Shields, Simmons, Smith of Georgia, Smith of Maryland, Smoot, Sterling, Stone, Swanson, Thomas, Thornton, Vardaman, Walsh, West, White, and Williams—48.

"(Mr. Jones having requested to be excused from voting, the Vice President declared a quorum present.)

"Accordingly the resolution of ratification was agreed to.

"The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the treaty with Portugal (Ex. S), looking to the advancement of the cause of general peace.

"The treaty was read the second time and proceeded with article by article.

"There being no amendments, the treaty was reported to the Senate.

"There still being no amendments,

"Mr. Swanson presented the following resolution of ratification:

"'Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty between the United States and Portugal (Ex. S, 63d Cong., 2d sess.), looking to the advancement of the cause of general peace, signed at Lisbon February 4, 1914.'

"Mr. Gallinger raised a point as to the presence of a quorum.

"On the call which ensued, 49 Senators responded to their names, so a quorum was present.

"That the said treaties be printed, with amendments."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In the discussion of this particular phase of the reservation under consideration the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] expressed very great concern lest, while a matter in which we were interested was under consideration by the council, our antagonist would be busily engaged in preparing for war, so that immediately the report of the council was submitted we might become the victim of our unpreparedness upon the one side and his extreme preparedness upon the other. Of course, Mr. President, that implies that the United States, among all the nations of the earth, would be blind to everything that was going on throughout the world, and particularly in the enemy country, and would be supinely awaiting a determination while the other party was feverishly engaged in a military program awaiting the judgment of the council.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will pardon me for just a moment. But, Mr. President, aside from that, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that that is one of the dangers of the Bryan treaties, which secured practically the unanimous consent of the Senate, as I have heretofore indicated. I conclude the reading of article 1 of the Bryan treaty with the Netherlands, as follows:

And they agree not to declare war or begin hostilities during such investigation and before the report is submitted.

Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I did not rise to make any complaint at all, but the Senator from Montana put a construction upon the words of the Senator from Missouri—I presume he was referring to me—and I wanted to know if he could not put in the RECORD what I said instead of his construction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be very glad to submit as a part of my remarks that portion of the remarks of the Senator from Missouri to which I have adverted.

Mr. REED. I have not seen my remarks as they appear in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have undertaken to state what the Senator said without having his remarks before me. I understood them to be to the effect that while the council was thus deliberating upon a matter submitted to it under the provisions of article 15, we would be under the peril of the other party feverishly preparing for war.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator—my very good friend, and a very fair man, as fair as his sometimes strong opinions will permit him to be—hardly stated my position correctly. I have not seen my remarks in print since I made them, but I know what my position would have been and what it was on the Bryan treaties.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be very glad to have the Senator state what his position was in reference to the matter to which I have just, perhaps inaccurately, alluded.

Mr. REED. That is precisely what I should like to do, and I desire to say only a word. My position on the Bryan treaties——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I made no question as to the Senator's position on the Bryan treaties. I was referring to some remarks which he made last Thursday in criticism of the covenant of the League of Nations, upon the ground that while the question in dispute between this country and another country was under consideration under the provisions of article 15 we were then in peril of having the other party arm against us.

Mr. REED. All that I desire to say is that the position I took on the Bryan treaties and the position I take with reference to this particular clause in the pending treaty is that, if the only effect is a delay of three months, it does not at all follow that it will mitigate the horrors of war, because one or both of the parties may during all of that time be busily engaged in preparing for war, and there is always the danger that one nation, the nation most inclined to follow policies of peace, will be relying upon the protection of a decision, whereas the other nation, probably a nation controlled by an autocracy of some kind, will know exactly what it is going to do and will be preparing all the time to strike. I do not offer that as a major objection, but I do offer it as one of the things that tend to show that three months' delay may not mean peace.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And the only purpose of my rising this morning is to indicate to the Senator that exactly the same condition confronts us now under the Bryan treaties to which we are already bound.

Mr. REED. And against which I voted. So, I am consistent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is quite in error about that. He voted for the Bryan treaty with the Netherlands, and his vote ratified the treaty.

Mr. REED. If that is true the record is in error, for I voted against every one of the Bryan treaties.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read from the executive record.

Mr. REED. If the record shows differently, it shows a mistake.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The executive record in connection with the treaty with the Netherlands reads as follows:

Mr. SWANSON offered the following resolution of ratification:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty between the United States and the Netherlands (Ex. P, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) looking to the advancement of the cause of general peace, signed at Washington, December 18, 1913."

Mr. CULBERSON demanded the yeas and nays, and, the call being seconded, the Vice President ordered that the roll be called, which was done, with the result that 36 votes were cast in the affirmative and 4 in the negative.

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Messrs. Ashurst, Bankhead, Brady, Bryan, Burton, Camden, Gallinger, Gronna, Hollis, Hughes, Johnson, Kern, Lea of Tennessee, Lee of Maryland, Lewis, Martine of New Jersey, Page, Perkins, Pomerene, Ransdell, Saulsbury, Shafroth, Sheppard, Simmons, Smith of Maryland, Smoot, Stone, Swanson, Thomas, Thompson, Thornton, Vardaman, Walsh, West, White, and Williams—36.

Those who voted in the negative are,

Messrs. Clapp, Fall, Jones, and Poindexter—4.

The call having developed the absence of a quorum, the Vice President directed that the roll be called, with the result that 50 Senators responded to their names, showing a quorum present.

The roll call for the yeas and nays on the resolution of ratification being renewed, resulted in 48 votes in the affirmative and none in the negative.

Those who voted in the affirmative are,—

Messrs. Bankhead, Brady, Bryan, Burton, Camden, Chamberlain, Clarke of Arkansas, Culberson, Gallinger, Gronna, Hollis, Hughes, Johnson, Kern, Lea of Tennessee, Lee of Maryland, Lewis, Lippitt, McCumber, Martine of New Jersey, Nelson, O'Gorman, Overman, Owen, Page, Perkins, Pittman, Pomerene, Ransdell, Reed, Saulsbury, Shafroth, Sheppard, Shields, Simmons, Smith of Georgia, Smith of Maryland, Smoot, Sterling, Stone, Swanson, Thomas, Thornton, Vardaman, Walsh, West, White, and Williams—48.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. REED. Of course I have never seen the executive record from which the Senator has read. I consistently opposed the Bryan treaties; I spoke against them, and I have repeatedly stated on the floor of the Senate that I opposed the Bryan treaties. The record is, in my opinion, simply an error. I made speeches against the Bryan treaties when they were being considered here in executive session, as many Senators will remember. That was one of my acts of insubordination. I engaged then in a somewhat lengthy discussion of them. There is a naked possibility that, coming into the Senate on a second call of the roll, I may have voted on this particular matter without having understood the question, voting simply with the great majority present. But I ask the Senator has he examined the votes on the other Bryan treaties?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator find me voting for them?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I find no case where the Senator from Missouri voted against any of them.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator find that I voted for them?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not find the Senator's name as voting at all except on the Netherlands treaty. The Senator was not sufficiently interested in their defeat at least to come in and vote against any of them.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, I was interested against them. The Senator wants to be fair with me——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. REED. There are Senators here who will remember that I spoke against those treaties. I have always said that, in my opinion, they were treaties that would bring us no good; that they were shortsighted; that they would be obeyed by the power that wanted to obey them and disobeyed by the other; that it would result in the nation employing the interval of time, if it wanted to be a vicious nation, in getting ready to strike us; that we would be the Nation that would rely upon honesty of conduct, but that the same motives could not be attributed to all the nations of the world. I think possibly I can find some remarks I have made of that kind which were not made in executive session; but to try to put me in the attitude of supporting the Bryan treaties by the last remark of the Senator that I was not sufficiently interested to vote against them is not fair. It is true that in the consideration of the Bryan treaties—and there were a number of them—a point was reached where it was perfectly manifest that the Senate was going to ratify them, and objection became absolutely useless.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, that statement of the Senator appears to be sustained by the record, for having taken votes upon several of the treaties and the temper of the Senate having been easily disclosed, the remainder of them went nem con. So that I read the test vote; the Senator, being present, was recorded in the affirmative, and I said that his vote carried the treaty. There were 48 votes——

Mr. REED. Was that the first treaty voted on?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the first treaty voted on was, according to my recollection, the treaty with Norway, and the Netherlands treaty was the second.

Mr. REED. I know I did not support them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not find the Senator recorded either way upon the first treaty, the treaty with Norway; but the point that I am making is that 49 Senators appeared to have been present; but the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], being present, asked to be excused from voting. It took 49 votes to make a quorum, and, if the Senator from Missouri had not been here, it would have been impossible, on that occasion at least, to ratify the treaty.

There is another matter to which I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri. In connection with the same remarks, to which I have already referred, he insisted that we were submitting these questions to the arbitrament of a foreign tribunal, a tribunal composed of foreigners. Of course, that is correct; the United States will not be permitted to vote upon the determination of any controversy to which it is a party, and naturally the question must then be determined by the votes of representatives of other countries. That, however, is also a feature of the Bryan treaties. I read article 2 of the treaty with the Netherlands, as follows:

The international commission shall be composed of five members, to be appointed as follows: One member shall be chosen from each country, by the government thereof; one member shall be chosen by each government from some third country; the fifth member shall be chosen by common agreement between the two governments, it being understood that he shall not be a citizen of either country. The expenses of the commission shall be paid by the two governments in equal proportion.

The international commission shall be appointed within six months after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, and vacancies shall be filled according to the manner of the original appointment.

It thus appears that—

One member shall be chosen from each country, by the government thereof; one member shall be chosen by each government from some third country—

That will make four, the third and fourth not being citizens of either country that is a party to the controversy—

The fifth member shall be chosen by common agreement between the two Governments, it being understood that he shall not be a citizen of either country.

So that of the five members of the international commission provided for by the Bryan treaties, in a case in which we are interested there will be just one United States citizen and four foreigners; so that is another consignment of water that has already gone by the mill. We have committed ourselves to the determination of all of these controversies by a tribunal of investigation and inquiry acting in substantially the same way as the council. We have stipulated that we will not go to war while the subject is under consideration by the commission, and we have agreed that the matter shall be determined by a commission four out of the five members of which are not citizens of this country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator if he does not see first this difference—of course he sees it, for he has stated it. We have one representative in the arbitration under the Bryan treaties.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite right.

Mr. REED. Under the League of Nations we have no representative. That is difference one. Second, under the Bryan treaties we participate in the selection of three of the judges, do we not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is correct.

Mr. REED. And unless we agree upon three of the judges, who constitute the majority, there can be no arbitration. That is true, is it not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. REED. Now, is there no difference between a tribunal where we must agree on three of the judges, one of whom must be one of our own citizens, and a tribunal where we agree on none of the judges, and every one of them is a foreigner, and probably allied in interest with our antagonist?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator can point out other differences between the council and the commission agreed upon under the Bryan treaties. That is not the point I am making. The point I am making is that, in the first place, we have already agreed to submit all of these controversies to the determination of a tribunal. In the second place, we have agreed that we will not go to war while that tribunal has these subjects under consideration. In the third place, the commission is composed of four out of five foreigners, as the matter has been expressed by the Senator. Now, there may be some countervailing considerations. I do not undertake to say.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will bear with me for a moment, under the Bryan treaties the determination is made by a majority, not by a unanimous vote.

Mr. REED. Certainly; it is made by a majority, and we help pick that majority, and we pick them with a view to the particular controversy where it may be possible to find fair judges, selected with reference to a particular controversy. In other words, it is not much different from an ordinary agreement in court for arbitration; but there is this difference between the two treaties: One is a treaty of arbitration, where we have a direct representation and a right to participate in the selection of a majority of the judges. The other is an agreement to submit a matter to a tribunal which, as we start out, we find is composed entirely of foreigners; we have nothing to say with reference to their selection, and these foreigners are inextricably tied together by every kind of alliance and every kind of agreement and every kind of interest. It is the difference between submitting a thing to a court which you have a reasonable ground to believe will be impartial and submitting it to a court over which you have no control and which you have every reason to believe will be partial.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely desire to add that the only objection I have to this reservation is that I do not care to have my country put in the attitude of saying—that is, so far as I can help it; there are some things I can not help; but I shall not willingly put my country in the attitude of saying—to the other nations of the earth, "If we have a controversy with you which you insist is domestic in character, it must be determined by the council; but if we have a controversy in which we insist that the question is domestic, we will determine it for ourselves." I think it scarcely comports with the dignity of this great country of ours and this Government of ours to tender any such proposition to any nation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. If, then, we are engaged in a dispute and the other party to the dispute insists that the question is not a domestic one, and we insist that it is, is the Senator in favor of having the council decide for the United States whether it is a domestic question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is in favor of giving the other country exactly the same privilege that we claim for ourselves. If we say for ourselves that we will not submit the controversy to the determination of the council, but that we shall judge it ourselves, we should give the other country exactly the same opportunity.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I should like to ask the Senator's construction of the present treaty, as to whether the council has jurisdiction to decide that question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the treaty is perfectly plain upon the matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think it has jurisdiction?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why, it does not seem to me that the word "jurisdiction" is very appropriately used. There can not be any controversy about what the covenant provides. I read:

> If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council, to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

I do not see how language could be plainer that that. If we raise the point that the question is domestic in character, the determination of the question as to whether it is or whether it is not goes to the council; and if the council shall determine that it is domestic it shall make no recommendation as to its settlement. If, on the other hand, we have a controversy with some other nation, and we ask the council to determine the matter as between us and the other nation, and the other nation insists that the question is domestic in character, the council would do exactly the same thing; it would determine the matter, and if it found that it was domestic in character it would make no recommendation as to settlement. The Senator can not misunderstand my position. If we are going to determine for ourselves that the question is domestic, it seems to me pretty small to say to the other party, "You shall not."

Mr. LENROOT. I thoroughly agree with the Senator in his construction. I think he is absolutely correct. Then I take it that the Senator's position is that he is willing to amend this treaty, taking away that jurisdiction from the council, but if the treaty can not be amended he is willing to have the council decide these domestic questions?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator need not go that far. I am in favor of the provision of the treaty just exactly as it stands. I have not the slightest fear about the matter. In the first place, Mr. President, cases are very rarely going to arise where one side will insist that a question is a domestic one; but, if such a case should arise, what reason have we to assume that the council is going to determine a matter of that character adversely to us, or that there would be prejudice against the contention of the United States?

Mr. PHELAN and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator construes the covenant as requiring unanimity on the part of the council in its decision as to whether or not a question is domestic?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. PHELAN. Then those who are interested in the determination of the question as parties would be excluded from participation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PHELAN. Therefore the United States, for instance, would not be in a position to protect itself?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If all the world held that we were wrong about the matter, as a matter of course the league would take jurisdiction.

Mr. PHELAN. I call the Senator's attention to a concrete fact:

There was a council in Paris the other day, and the question of racial equality was submitted to it. I believe that body was called a commission; and, as I read the report which has come out—there has been no official report of the proceedings—by a vote of 11 to 5 it was declared that the league covenant should be interpreted to confer national or racial equality; that is, giving Japanese, for instance, the same rights of immigration and naturalization as other nationals. There is a case where a majority has acted, and I understand that those nations which were most interested in defeating the proposal—Great Britain and the United States—voted in the negative. There they had an opportunity to protect themselves. Here, according to the Senator from Montana, if the same proposition arises neither Great Britain nor the United States would be in a position to protect itself. Therefore I believe that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], defining what is a domestic question and debarring the league from jurisdiction over such questions, is a necessary thing to protect the interests of this country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. I merely desire to say to the Senator from California that if he studies the so-called Lodge reservation upon this matter he will see that it does not undertake to define our domestic questions. It says that domestic questions relating to certain subjects shall not be considered by the league, leaving the question as to what are domestic questions to be determined in some way or other.

Mr. PHELAN. My understanding of the Lodge reservation No. 4—I have not it before me—is that questions of immigration, commerce, tariff, and the like, shall be regarded as domestic questions, and shall be excluded from the consideration of the league, thus denying the league jurisdiction.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to get the Senator from California straight about this if I can. The Senator obviously is in error concerning the meaning of this reservation. The word "commerce" is in it. If his interpretation is correct, then every question in relation to commerce—even international commerce, which has no domestic aspect at all—is declared to be without the jurisdiction of the league. That is not the purpose of this section at all. It reads:

> The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction, and declares that all domestic and political questions relating—

To commerce or relating to immigration—that is, all domestic questions relating to these subjects—are without the jurisdiction of the league.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, it is a reservation by the United States to decide for itself what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. PHELAN. That is satisfactory to me. The rest is surplusage.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in order to clear up one or two questions which the Senator from Montana has raised, I want just a few minutes of the time of the Senate.

The Senator undertakes to put me in the attitude of being estopped from saying that the article of the league covenant which provides for the submission of all questions to the council of the league, and that the parties can not go to war pending its decision, and never if the decision is unanimous, is dangerous, because one nation might prepare for war during the interval of abeyance. The Senator so insists on the ground that I voted, as he states and as the Journal he read bears him out in stating, for the Bryan peace treaties.

Of course, we never examine the Journal. The last thing in the world I would do would be to accuse one of the clerks of the Senate either of willfully misrecording a vote or of being stupid in the performance of his business, for neither statement is true; but mistakes occur, and while human recollection is fallible, it is not possible that my recollection is in error about my position with reference to the Bryan treaties. I know that I made speeches opposing the Bryan treaties. My impression at present is that they were all made in executive session in the early days of the debates on those treaties. If made in executive session, of course they do not appear in the RECORD; but one of the first things I was severely criticized for doing in the Senate, as being contrary to the desires of the President, was the opposition I manifested to the Bryan treaties.

I said then, and I say now, this regarding the Bryan treaties: They simply provide for arbitration, and that a nation shall not go to war until there has been a finding by a board of arbitrators. After that a nation was at perfect liberty to go to war. So that all the Bryan treaties did and all they were intended to do was to delay action. They did not provide for a maintenance of the status quo during that period of arbitration.

I remember illustrating it in this wise: We have a controversy with Japan and Mexico over the attempt of Japan to establish not only a colony but possibly to gain control and a military base and naval base in one of the ports of Mexico. We protest against that action and notify Japan that under the Monroe doctrine we will not permit it, whereupon Japan under the Bryan treaty demands arbitration. Three or four or five or six months elapse, during which time the United States is absolutely bound not to lift a hand, but in the meantime there is no provision binding Japan to cease operations. Accordingly, during that six months, if she were to see fit, she could land an army of a million men, she could establish an impregnable fortress, she could mass her fleet in the waters of the Pacific and place them under the guns of that fortress, so that when the time had expired and we were permitted to act, we would be obliged to move our troops against the guns of a fortress and against an intrenched army of a million men, whereas if we had no such arrangement, at the first moment it became manifest Japan intended to violate the Monroe doctrine we would move our troops and our ships to the scene of action, and we would be able to protect our country with a very slight loss of men and material.

That was my fundamental objection, and I added at that time that it was no answer to say that we, as well as the other nation, might prepare, for that would not save us anything, but that the real difficulty was and is under all these treaties that the United States, always impelled by a high regard for the spirit of the obligations of treaties, would probably rely upon the other nation complying with the treaty, whereas, as experience has shown, autocratic governments and military governments have generally employed to their advantage every such situation as would develop under the circumstances to which I have just alluded.

Now, what has all that to do with this treaty? Where is the parallel between the two? Because I may have agreed that one of my clients should arbitrate a particular question before a certain tribunal, that does not mean that I am thereafter bound to agree that my client shall submit to an entirely different tribunal the arbitration of every question with every individual. It may be entirely wise to agree to arbitrate a question with A or to arbitrate all disputes arising with A, but very unwise to agree to arbitrate all disputes with everybody arising anywhere and at any time before the same or an entirely different kind of court.

But the main point I desire to urge is the essential difference in the courts and causes to be determined. Every lawyer knows that when it is proposed to him to arbitrate a dispute between his client and another, the first question to be settled is the arbiters. If you can secure fair arbiters for that particular question, you sometimes, and, indeed, frequently, agree to arbitration. The ordinary method is for each of the parties to select an arbiter and then the two by agreement select a disinterested man for the third arbiter. Accordingly the litigant has this security, that he knows that one of the men going upon the board of arbitration is naturally friendly to him and will defend his interests. He knows that the third or deciding vote must be cast by a man whom the litigants' representatives have, after examination, determined to be an absolutely fair and impartial man. So that in fact you have an impartial tribunal to decide the particular case.

It is possible that between nations, if you segregate a particular controversy, you may find a representative of some nation, a citizen of some nation, so far removed by circumstances from an interest in the controversy that his decision will be absolutely impartial. You may find one or two such disinterested individuals. Therefore, an arrangement to arbitrate where the parties are to agree to arbiters in each particular case may be a feasible thing between nations in many cases and a thing highly to be desired and which has not often been done.

Let us compare that to the proposition that is before us. The council is not a board of arbitration selected at the time for a particular case. It is a fixed tribunal, the members of which are selected now, and that membership is permanent. If the members of that tribunal are interested in the controversy there is no way to disqualify them or take them from the board. The only parties that are not allowed to sit are the parties to the controversy, but the parties to the controversy may not be and, indeed, almost inevitably are not the parties at interest. I illustrated that the other day. Suppose that a controversy arises over the Panama Canal Zone, involving the right of the United States to permit ships of her own to go through her own canal free and to charge toll upon the ships of other nations. Suppose that dispute arises between the United States and Great Britain. Of course, Great Britain would not sit and we would not sit upon the board, because we are parties to the controversy. But who would sit and who would constitute the board?

France. Is France interested? She is as much interested as Great Britain in proportion to the number of vessels that she has upon the waters of the ocean, for if her vessels could go through free it would advantage her just as much as it would advantage Great Britain if her vessels could go through free or on a parity with ours. Nevertheless she is not disqualified, but sits. The man who will deny that is not a fair man.

Who else would sit? Japan. Is Japan interested? She has a great navy of war and of peace. She is interested just as England is interested. Italy would sit; she has a navy of war and of peace and is interested. Spain would sit; and she has a navy of war and of peace and is interested. Belgium would sit; she has a navy of war and of peace and is interested. Greece would sit; and she has a navy of war and of peace and is interested. Brazil would sit; and Brazil has a navy of war and of peace and is interested.

We do not sit, and we have no voice. So that instead of having a tribunal where we have a direct representation of two men, where the deciding vote is to be cast by some man picked from a disinterested country, if you can find one in such a controversy—and I do not believe you could in the whole world—you are going before a packed tribunal, the interests of every member being against the claim of the United States. Do Senators see no distinction between that kind of an arrangement and an agreement to arbitrate before arbiters they were to help name? If they were representing their clients, they would see it very quickly.

Again, every nation that I have spoken of is not only interested in the particular controversy, but every representative on the board being an alien to the United States, those nations are all obligated by interests in such manner as to make those interests controlling. What have you to say of the situation of Greece in a controversy between the United States and Great Britain? Is there a man living who supposes that the representative of Greece would be really a free moral agent? Is there a man here who does not know that Greece has been practically sustained by the strong arm of Great Britain for many years, and that Great Britain was so potential in the last war that she practically pulled the King of Greece from his throne and used the waters of Greece as a naval base and the land of Greece as a military base? I do not complain of Great Britain having done this, but to talk about Greece being anything but a British pawn in the great international game is utter and sheer nonsense.

Is Belgium a free moral agent? She was set up as a buffer State to be interposed between Germany and those waters which are contiguous to Great Britain and France. She was sustained by the strength and majesty of the British Army and the British Navy, and the invasion of Belgium was a direct blow at Great Britain. While I will not say it was the real cause, it was undoubtedly a principal cause of Great Britain's ready and magnificent response.

Would Spain be disinterested? Aside from the interest I have already mentioned, there is not a Spaniard living who does not in his heart hate the United States, for every one of them regards the United States as being responsible for having reduced Spain to a fifth-rate power at the cost of her possessions in the Pacific and in the Atlantic. So it rankles in their hearts and will for a century of time.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to refer to all the others, save only Japan. Is there a man here who doubts that in the controversy I have named Japan would be bound to Great Britain by other interests than the mere interest of navigation? In the Orient they are partners in the greatest scheme of exploitation that has occurred in this world since Julius Cæsar.

So we do not by this treaty propose arbitration. If the treaty stopped at arbitration, we might all stop much of our caviling. It is not the arbitration feature we are discussing. It is the decision by a fixed body, that body composed exclusively of foreigners, to decide every question between the United States and any foreign power, and the question may involve the life of this Republic.

The Foreign Relations Committee appended a reservation for which I was responsible. It provided that the United States would not submit its national honor or its vital interest; that it would not submit the honor and integrity of this great Nation and would not submit a question involving the life of this Republic, established in the blood of our fathers and baptized in the tears of our mothers. That reservation was defeated in the Senate, and I think the distinguished gentleman from Montana [Mr. WALSH] voted to defeat it.

So the bald proposition is that we will submit to a tribunal composed exclusively of political representatives of foreign States, for the most part monarchies, the life of this Republic. Do you undertake to compare that with the Bryan treaties? There is no comparison.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to inquire of the Senator whether exactly the same questions would not be submitted under the Bryan treaties that are to be submitted under the covenant? Is not the character of questions identical in the two cases? If we submit to that council a question involving the life of the Nation have we not equally agreed to submit a question involving the life of the Nation under the Bryan treaties?

Mr. REED. Possibly that is true, but when you come to the decision in the one case and in the other, what is the difference? Under the Bryan treaties we submit the controversy to decision and when the decision is rendered it binds nobody.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator whom the decision of the council binds?

Mr. REED. I am coming to that, sir. Under the Bryan treaties it is expressly provided that when the decision is rendered—

> The high contracting parties reserve the right to act independently on the subject matter of the dispute after the report of the commission shall have been submitted.

That is to say, they reserve the right to disregard the report, to do just what they please in whatsoever way or manner they please, to exercise their full right of sovereignty; but under the pending treaty if there is a unanimous decision against us, we can not go to war, though the life of the United States is at stake, without bringing the whole world against us. That is the difference.

Is that a substantial difference? Let us bring it to illustration. We have a controversy with Mexico. Under the Bryan treaty it goes to arbitration; the arbitrators decide against us; we are not satisfied. We go on and do business with Mexico just as we think we ought to. Suppose we have the same controversy with Mexico under the pending treaty; it goes to the council of the League of Nations; the decision is unanimous against us; we then undertake to enforce what we believe are our rights, and immediately the whole power of the League of Nations is massed against us.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to make an inquiry of the Senator. Suppose we had a controversy with Mexico and we submitted it under the Bryan treaty. We choose one of our citizens and Mexico chooses one of her citizens; each of us then chooses a citizen of some other country, and a fifth is chosen by common agreement. The international commission so provided hear the evidence upon both sides and then decide against us; decide that Mexico is right and that we are wrong. Does the Senator believe we would go to war with Mexico under those circumstances?

Mr. REED. That would depend entirely upon the case, sir. It is very probable that if the decision apparently was rendered in an honest way, and if it was an honest matter of dispute, we would abide by the decision, even though it hurt us considerably; but it is also true that if the decision seemed to be tainted with fraud or if it seemed to involve great wrong and outrage to this country, our people would decide it for themselves; for, let me tell the wise men assembled in Washington at both ends of the Capitol, that once this entity called the American people is aroused they yet control, thank God, in this Republic.

There is no comparison between the two propositions, and there has not been any comparison between them from the first, except the strained one made by special pleaders who seek to justify a bad cause by a weak and nonapplicable precedent.

Mr. President, let us see about the unanimous decision arrived at by the council. There has been much misstatement in regard to that. One misstatement was inadvertently just made by the Senator from Montana. He asked, in substance, Are we going to protest when all the world is against us? as though all the world had sat down together in this tribunal, and the unanimous opinion of all the world was against the United States.

In the first place, the world does not sit on the council at all; and I might go so far as to say that representatives of the peoples of the world do not sit there. The representative of the autocratic Government of Japan sits there; possibly at some time in the future the representative of the present highly enlightened and Christian Government of Mexico may sit there, Mexico being ineligible now; but, to refer only to the nations that can sit there, the representative of the Imperial Government of Great Britain sits there; the representative of the King of Spain sits there; the representative of the King of Greece sits there. There are the representatives of only two republics on the whole council. The remainder of them are the representatives of kingdoms or something worse; so that the council is made up of political representatives of political states.

In the next place, after our antagonist has withdrawn they only represent 7 of the nations of the earth, while there are approximately 75 self-governing states of the world. There are 23 members of the League of Nations that do not even sit there; 7 nations out of all the world participate in the decision; yet that is called the opinion of all the world when all the world but 7 nations has been disfranchised, and those 7 nations, as has been argued time and time again here, in all probability are under the control of one nation. Is it hard to get a unanimous-consent agreement? Not very, when there are things to trade.

The President protested against the Shantung outrage, we are told, and in the next to his last letter which he sent regarding the Fiume controversy he lays down principles which would have made the adoption of the Shantung infamy impossible if they had been adhered to. The President said in his note of February 10:

> It is a time to speak with the utmost frankness. The Adriatic issue as it now presents itself raises the fundamental question as to whether the American Government can on any terms cooperate with its European associates in the great work of maintaining the peace of the world by removing the primary causes of war. This Government does not doubt its ability to reach amicable understandings with the associated Governments as to what constitutes equity and justice in international dealings, for differences of opinion as to the best methods of applying just principles have never obscured the vital fact that in the main the several Governments have entertained the same fundamental conception of what those principles are. But if substantial agreement on what is just and reasonable is not to determine international issues, if the country possessing the most endurance in pressing its demands rather than the country armed with a just cause is to gain the support of the powers, if forcible seizure of coveted areas is to be permitted and condoned and is to receive ultimate justification by creating a situation so difficult that decision favorable to the aggressor is deemed a practical necessity; if deliberately incited ambition is, under the name of national sentiment, to be rewarded at the expense of the small and the weak; if, in a word, the old order of things which brought so many evils on the world is still to prevail, then the time is not yet come when this Government can enter a concert of powers the very existence of which must depend upon a new spirit and a new order. The American people are willing to share in such high enterprise, but many among them are fearful lest they become entangled in international policies and committed to international obligations foreign alike to their ideals and their traditions. To commit them to such a policy as that embodied in the latest Adriatic proposals and to obligate them to maintain injustice as against the claims of justice would be to provide the most solid ground for such fears. This Government can undertake no such grave responsibility.

That exactly outlines the situation with reference to Shantung; yet there was a unanimous decision, and the President was constrained to join in that decision because of the exigencies of the case. So there was a unanimous decision to all intents and purposes in the Adriatic matter; and against that the President now rises to protest. There is no trouble, Mr. President, in securing a unanimous-consent agreement where the powers have many axes to grind and one power agrees to turn the grindstone for another, provided a similar and corresponding service is rendered for it. Unanimous decisions are easily arranged where there is sufficient trading material and where the parties trade cold-bloodedly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator from Missouri proceeds further, will he permit me now to put into the RECORD the statement from his remarks on last Friday to which I earlier referred?

Mr. REED. Yes; I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read from the RECORD of last Thursday, as follows:

Mr. REED. It is well said, and let me pause long enough to say—and I shall be very glad to continue the debate when I return to the Chamber—that there is another side to it. I want it to end instanter. The delay of three or six months may mean the life of the United States. The waiting to give the other nation three months or six months to get ready to strike may mean the difference between a great war and no war at all.

Mr. REED. I have no complaint as to that. That is just what I said. That was not quite the way the Senator stated it, but I make no complaint, for he did not mean to misrepresent me. However, I would rather have my own words stand for what I said. What I desired to say I said, and what I said I stand by.

Mr. President, in view of the situation which has arisen, while I meant to discuss another phase of the question, I do not feel like proceeding, and I will yield the floor, as I understand the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] desires to make an announcement in a moment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Alabama makes the sad announcement, which I know will bring sorrow to every Member of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the unanimous-consent agreement applying to to-day may remain in force and take effect to-morrow, Tuesday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The unanimous-consent agreement applying to to-day stands in effect as applicable to to-morrow.

DEATH OF SENATOR BANKHEAD.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, it is my sad duty to announce to the Senate that this morning my colleague, Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, died suddenly at his temporary residence in the city of Washington.

For a quarter of a century he has been the foremost figure in the State of Alabama. I think he was the one remaining Member of the Senate who served in the army of the Confederacy and thus connected this body with that portion of the history of our country.

He was a man whose sterling character, probity, and earnest devotion to duty have given him a fixed place in the history of our Nation and of the State which he so long and faithfully represented in the Halls of Congress. He died with the love and respect of his constituents, of his friends, and of all who knew him.

At the proper time, Mr. President, I shall ask the Senate to set apart a day on which proper tribute may be paid to his memory. I now submit the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 316) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Senate resolution 316.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD, late a Senator from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That a committee of nine Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate to take order for superintending the funeral of the late Senator.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the remains of the dead Senator be removed from Washington to Jasper, Ala., for burial in charge of the Sergeant at Arms, attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER appointed, under the second resolution, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. NELSON, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. BALL, and Mr. HARRISON as the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of my deceased colleague, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 2, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 1, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

"O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!"

Broaden, we beseech Thee, O Lord, the scope of our intellectual vision, quicken our conscience, and bring us into a closer communion with Thee.

We can not know Thee, since we are finite and Thou art infinite; but we can know Thee better and conform our ways to Thy ways as it is given us to see them.

"For of him, and through him, and to him are all things: to whom be glory forever." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 28, 1920, and Sunday, February 29, 1920, was read and approved.

RETURN OF THE RAILROADS.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed 30,000 additional copies of the act (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of the disputes between carriers and their employees; to provide to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes—10,000 copies to be distributed through the document room and 20,000 through the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the printing of 30,000 additional copies of the railroad act—10,000 copies to be distributed through the document room and 20,000 through the folding room. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Ought not that matter to be referred to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. ESCH. I tried to get in touch with the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing on Saturday and also this morning, but I have been unable to see him. There is such a demand for copies of the act that I thought prompt action was necessary, especially in view of the fact that there are only five or six copies of the bill remaining in the document room.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many does the gentleman propose to have printed?

Mr. ESCH. Thirty thousand copies—20,000 to be distributed through the folding room and 10,000 copies through the document room.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And how much is it going to cost?

Mr. ESCH. I do not know. That is why I wish to confer with the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MILLER. How many would that allot to each Member?

Mr. ESCH. Forty-six to each Member.

Mr. GARD. The allotment through the folding room amounts to 46 to each Member?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. GARD. And the other 10,000 are to be distributed through the document room?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some resolutions adopted by 6,000 ex-service men at a mass meeting at St. Louis recently upon the subject of legislation for relief in the way of additional compensation for the men who have seen service in the late war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the printing of certain resolutions passed at a meeting in St. Louis of ex-service men relative to additional compensation. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Whether or not this would be embarrassing in any way to our colleagues on the other side?

Mr. IGOE. I do not know. My purpose is only to get it printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CALENDER FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT—CONFERRING JURISDICTION UPON THE COURT OF CLAIMS TO HEAR CERTAIN INDIAN CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. To-day is suspension day, and the Clerk will call the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent is the bill H. R. 10105, conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate claims which the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, this matter was up before and objection was made at that time. I object.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. I reserve my objection if the gentleman desires me to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was under consideration two weeks ago, objection was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on the ground that certain groups of Indians were permitted to bring suit as shown in lines 2, 3, 4, 5 of page 2. In order to obviate that objection, if consideration is given to the bill, I will offer an amendment to strike out all of the language after the word "tribes," in line 2, page 2, down to and including the words "heirs" in line 5. That language was inserted at the suggestion of the Interior Department, and not by the author of the bill. We had no reason to have any groups or individual Indians bring suit who are not enrolled members of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma. The gentleman will remember that when this matter was being discussed some two weeks ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was afraid that it might permit members or groups outside of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma and who were not members of the tribes to bring suit. If permission is given for the consideration, we will move to strike out all after the word "tribes," in line 2, page 2, down to and including the word "heirs" at the end of line 5. That would strike out all of that objectionable language.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, in line 10 the gentleman would have to strike out the words "bands, groups."

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, there would be no objection to that.

Mr. WALSH. And over in line 24, page 3, the same words?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will offer those amendments, I shall withdraw my objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. I agree to offer them.

Mr. WALSH. Then I withdraw my objection on the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have such an amendment prepared now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman in charge of the bill enlighten us as to the necessity of the scope of the inquiry conferred upon the Court of Claims here to examine and adjudicate any and all claims contained in this bill and other bills on the calendar? I ask for the purpose of information, because there are several bills like this upon the calendar, and I apprehend they all stand on the same basis?

Mr. HASTINGS. I would like to say to the gentleman from Ohio that I can not answer so much about the other bills, but so far as this bill is concerned the Five Civilized Tribes are now going out from under the jurisdiction of the Government, their affairs being about wound up, and so far as the Cherokee Tribe is concerned, all of the land has been divided and all of the money paid out. It is like a minor arriving at age, and all they want is to examine the books and file any objection against any item of money paid by the Government out of their funds that they think ought not to have been paid, and the same thing is true in reference to the other Five Civilized Tribes, and that is what is intended by this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Simply to direct attention of the gentleman from Oklahoma that that language also occurs in line 5, page 3.

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, I will strike it out, of course, wherever that occurs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will yield for a question?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This bill as introduced provided that any payment heretofore made by the United States on account of any claim sued upon may be treated as a set-off to any such claim, but may not be treated as an estoppel. The committee recommended an amendment striking that language out. I would like to ask the gentleman if the effect would not be the same whether it was in or out?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not think it made any difference, but the department recommended that it be stricken from the bill, and it was done at the request of the Interior Department.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I take it, under the terms of the bill elsewhere provided, that if there has been any dispute heretofore, and a settlement of that dispute has been made and the money paid to the Indians in accordance with the settlement, that is of no value except to the extent that the money was paid, and any settlement heretofore made under the terms of this bill will have no effect, whether that provision was in the bill or out of the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, I think if a settlement has been made and payment made to these Indians, that they would not have the right to recover——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But would they not have the right——

Mr. HASTINGS. That is my judgment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is what the purpose of the bill is, one of them. But if a settlement has been made and money paid to the Indians in accordance with the settlement, all the Government can do under the terms of this bill, as I understand it, is to set off the amount of money which may be paid. The settlement is wiped out as a settlement. The Indians bring suit for what they think originally they ought to recover, and having obtained the money in the settlement the settlement is now abandoned.

Mr. HASTINGS. Upon what language does the gentleman base his opinion?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Why, the language of the bill only confines the settlement of claims to adjudicated claims. Most claims have not been adjudicated. They have been settled and the money paid if there have been such.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, I do not place that sort of construction on any language in the bill. Just before the gentleman came in, I do not know whether he overheard the colloquy between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and myself about the elimination of the language he objected to on page 2 and elsewhere in the bill——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes; as to certain groups of Indians, and so forth. But the language of the bill is to bring suit on any claim which they may have against the United States which claim has not heretofore been determined or adjudicated.

Mr. HASTINGS. If it has been determined or adjudicated, of course they can not bring suit upon it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They can not if there has been a determination upon it in court.

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, of course, if an examination of the books discloses that they think that the Government of the United States has wrongly appropriated their funds and erroneously used them this would permit them to go into court and contest the item just like a minor on coming of age would have the right to contest any item in a guardian's report.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, well, the case has not anything to do with a guardian here or a minor in court. If the court had settled these claims they would be forever settled. Here is a proposition where the Indians have a claim under a treaty which they may have made long ago, and it has been settled by the Government of the United States and the money paid in accordance with that settlement, but it has not been adjudicated or determined by the court, and they still can make their claim, not based upon the books but based upon the recollection of the Indians many years old, of occurrences many years past.

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, I never heard any such contention as that made, and I respectfully suggest to the gentleman that I do not believe that any language of this bill would bear that construction.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, the language of this bill is very similar to the language in other bills providing for the claims of Indians, and that has been the determination in the past as to what it meant. I have no doubt that is the case here.

Mr. HASTINGS. No suggestion of that kind has ever been made in the committee or by the department or elsewhere to the effect that that is the construction that is placed on the language of this bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That will be the construction that will be placed upon it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill,

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10105) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate claims which the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate any and all claims arising under or growing out of any treaty stipulation or agreement of the United States with the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole Indian Nations or Tribes, or any act of Congress, or of the executive departments, affecting their property, lands, or funds which said Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole Indian Nations or Tribes, or any band or organized group of Cherokee Indians or enrolled individual Indian members of aforesaid Indian nations, or their heirs, may have against the United States and which claims have not heretofore been determined or adjudicated: Provided, That said Court of Claims shall also hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate any claims which the United States may have against said Indian nations or tribes, bands, groups, or individual claimants: Provided further, That the suits be instituted within five years from date of approval of this act: Provided also, That from decisions of the Court of Claims in said suits appeals may be taken as in other cases to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Court of Claims shall have full authority by proper orders and process to bring in and make parties to such suits any or all persons deemed by it necessary or proper to the final determination of the matters in controversy.

The claim or claims of each of said Indian nations, tribes, bands, groups, or individual Indians, as the case may be, shall be presented separately or jointly by petition in the Court of Claims, and such action shall make the petitioner party plaintiff or plaintiffs and the United States party defendant. Such petition on the part of any such nation or tribe shall be verified by the attorney or attorneys employed to prosecute such claim or claims under contract or contracts with the principal chief or governor of the nation or tribe interested and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and on the part of any band, group, or individual Indians by the attorney or attorneys employed by them, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

A copy of the petition shall, in each case, be served upon the Attorney General of the United States, and he or some attorney from the Department of Justice, to be designated by him, is hereby directed to appear and defend the interests of the United States in said cases.

Any payment heretofore made by the United States on account of any claim sued upon may be pleaded as a set-off to any such claim, but may not be pleaded as an estoppel.

Any and all claims against the United States within the purview of this act shall be forever barred unless suit be instituted or petition filed in the Court of Claims within five years from the date of approval of this act as provided herein. Upon the final determination of any suit or action instituted under this act the Court of Claims shall decree such amount or amounts as it shall find reasonable to pay the attorney or attorneys employed therein by any of the above-named Indian nations, tribes, bands, or groups, or individual Indians for their services and expenses, and in no case shall the aggregate amounts decreed by said Court of Claims be in excess of the amount or amounts stipulated in the contract of employment, or in excess of a sum equal to 15 per cent of the amount of recovery against the United States.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "Congress" strike out "or of the executive departments, affecting their property, lands, or funds," and insert "in relation to Indian affairs."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the bill should be on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled on the last suspension day that, following the precedents, it would be considered that the unanimous consent given to its consideration would include its consideration in the House.

The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment that eliminates the next committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HASTINGS: Page 2, line 2, after the word "tribes," strike out "or any band or organized group of Cherokee Indians or enrolled individual Indian members of aforesaid Indian Nations, or their heirs."

The SPEAKER. Then, the gentleman wishes to vote down the committee amendment?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Now, Mr. Speaker, on page 2, line 10, after the word "nations" I move to strike out the language:

Or tribes, bands, groups, or individual claimants.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the first amendment, I think, would come on page 2, line 7, after the word "adjudicated."

Mr. HASTINGS. What amendment is that?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The amendment which reads:

Provided, That said Court of Claims shall also hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate any claims which the United States may have against said Indian nations or tribes, bands, groups, or individual claimants.

Is the gentleman offering his amendment now to come at that place?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am offering it in line 10, so as to cut out the tribes, bands, groups, or individual claimants.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But that proviso would come under it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the gentleman want to cut out the whole proviso?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; I am satisfied.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, after the word "nations," page 2, line 10, to strike out "or tribes, bands, groups, or individual claimants."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HASTINGS: Page 2, line 10, after the word "nations," strike out "tribes, bands, groups, or individual claimants."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, after the word "within," strike out the word "five" and insert the word "two."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, on line 21, page 2, I move to strike out, beginning with the word "tribes," in line 21, "tribes, bands, groups, or individual Indians, as the case may be."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HASTINGS: Page 2, line 21, strike out "tribes, bands, groups, or individual Indians, as the case may be."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, on page 3, line 5, strike out all of line 5.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. All of lines 5, 6, and 7.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is right. All of lines 5, 6, and 7.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HASTINGS: Page 3, line 5, strike out all of lines 5, 6, and 7.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 13, strike out all of lines 13, 14, and 15.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendmittee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 18, strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "two."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, on line 24, page 3, I move to strike out after the word "nations" the words, "tribes, bands, or groups, or individual Indians."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HASTINGS: Page 3, line 24, after the word "nations" strike out: "Tribes, bands, or groups, or individual Indians."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend on page 4, line 3, by striking out the figures "15" and inserting in lieu thereof "10."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN of Illinois: Page 4, line 3, strike out the figures "15" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "10."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Has the gentleman from Oklahoma any objection to that amendment? In most of these bills reported you have provided an attorney's fee not exceeding 10 per cent.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think in some cases it ought to be more. Some of these amounts may be trivial, and in that case, of course, 10 per cent would not be sufficient compensation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, if the amounts are trivial the suits ought not to be brought by an Indian tribe. We have a whole lot of these cases, and we ought to adopt the same principle in one as in another.

Mr. HASTINGS. I accept it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 93, noes 7.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HASTINGS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

THE OSAGE NATION.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10401) to amend section 14 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved April 26, 1906 (34 Stats., p. 137).

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD], who has had charge of the bill, to explain the necessity of the inclusion with regard to the Osage Tribe of Indians.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio, I will say that at the time the railroads, most of them, were built through the Indian Territory, the Government granted easements as to rights of way, and, later, when that country became settled and our cities began building, it became necessary at times to abrogate the provision where the title to any part of these easements or rights of way could not revert to corporations or railroad companies, with the result that in the act of April 26, 1906, so far as the Five Civilized Tribes were concerned, that act prepared the way for the Secretary of the Interior, wherever necessary, to issue title to certain property that became necessary in the building up of these towns.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARD. Is that the act of June 24, 1906, that the gentleman refers to?

Mr. HOWARD. It is section 14 of the act of April 6, 1906. This only changes that by changing the word "Osage," which recently has become necessary in the improvement and development of that country, to make it possible at times for railroad companies and cities or private individuals to exchange lands in order to build industrial tracts, and so forth, in the towns and cities of the Osage Nation. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this is a departmental measure, and that it has the approval of the Osage Council.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved April 26, 1906 (34 Stat., p. 137), be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That the lands in the Osage, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole Nations reserved from allotment or sale under any act of Congress for the use or benefit of any person, corporation, or organization shall be conveyed to the person, corporation, or organization entitled thereto: Provided, That if any tract or parcel thus reserved shall before conveyance thereof be abandoned for the use for which it was reserved by the party in whose interest the reservation was made, such tract or parcel shall revert to the tribe and be disposed of as other surplus lands thereof: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to land reserved from allotment because of the right of any railroad or railway company therein in the nature of an easement for right of way, depot, station grounds, water stations, stockyards, or other uses connected with the maintenance and operation of such company's railroad, title to which tracts may be acquired by the railroad or railway company under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior at a valuation to be determined by him; but if any such company shall fail to make payment within the time prescribed by the regulations or shall cease to use such land for the purpose for which it was reserved, title thereto shall thereupon vest in the owner of the legal subdivision of which the land so abandoned is a part, except lands within a municipality, the title to which, upon abandonment, shall vest in such municipality.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

"Provided further, That so far as lands within the Osage Nation are affected by this act, nothing herein contained shall be construed as divesting the Osage Tribe of its title to the oil, gas, coal, or other minerals covered by said lands, title to which was expressly reserved to the Osage Tribe for a period of 25 years from and after the 8th day of April, 1906, by the act of June 28, 1906 (34 Stat., p. 539)."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 3.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CLASSIFICATION OF VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11311) providing for the classification of vessels of the United States.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the classification of vessels of the United States, and for such other purposes as are the proper functions of a classification bureau, all departments of the Government and all commissions created by the Government are hereby directed to recognize the American Bureau of Shipping as their agency, so long as the American Bureau of Shipping continues to be maintained as an organization which has no capital stock and pays no dividends: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce and the chairman of the Shipping Board shall each appoint one representative who shall represent the Government upon the executive committee of the American Bureau of Shipping, and the bureau shall agree that these representatives shall be accepted by them as active members of such committee. Such representatives of the Government shall serve without any compensation, excepting necessary traveling expenses: Provided further, That the official list of merchant vessels published by the Government shall hereafter contain a notation clearly indicating all vessels classed by the American Bureau of Shipping.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

LIMITED NUMBER OF PASSENGERS ON CARGO VESSELS.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11313) to permit transportation of a limited number of passengers on cargo vessels.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That cargo vessels may carry not to exceed 16 persons in addition to the crew from any port or place in the United States to any foreign port, or from any foreign port to another foreign port, or from any foreign port to a port of the United States; and such cargo vessels shall not be held to be "passenger vessels" or "vessels carrying passengers" within the meaning of the inspection laws and the rules and regulations thereunder: Provided, That nothing herein shall be taken to exempt such cargo vessels from the laws, rules, and regulations respecting life-saving equipment: Provided further, That when any cargo vessel carries persons other than the crew as above provided for, the owner, agent, or master of the vessel shall first notify the said persons of the presence on board of any dangerous articles, as defined by the law, if there be any on board, or of any other condition or circumstance which would constitute a risk of safety for passenger or crew.

Failure on the part of the owner, agent, or master of the vessel to give such notice shall subject the vessel to a penalty of $500, which may be mitigated or remitted by the Secretary of Commerce upon a proper representation of the facts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state how the number of passengers to be carried was arrived at? This seems to be a rather unusual number—16.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I will be glad to explain it. A number of the vessels of the United Fruit Co. have accommodations for 16 passengers. The bill as originally drawn provided for 12 passengers, that being the number on some Japanese steamers, but the United Fruit Co. stated that number would interfere with their line of traffic on some of their boats, which formerly were not under American registry. That is the principal reason the number was increased so as to provide for the four additional passengers. Commercial travelers and business men believed it would be extremely useful in extending our foreign trade.

Mr. WALSH. Will this permit a vessel engaged in lake commerce to take some passengers on board going to a port in Canada, and thence to a United States port, and to carry those passengers the entire journey?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Only to a foreign port. Would the gentleman call Canadian ports foreign ports?

Mr. WALSH. I should say they would be.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It had not been particularly considered by the committee. I think, however, it would be an advantage to permit the freight boats on the Great Lakes to do this line of business. I know some of these boats have carried passengers who have been obliged to sleep in the officers' quarters.

Mr. WALSH. This would not permit the freight steamers that ply on Long Island Sound, touching at domestic ports, to carry passengers. Why is this discrimination made?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. This bill was introduced particularly for the purpose of extending our foreign trade if possible, and it was thought that some of these smaller-sized freight vessels might reach ports that would not otherwise be reached, because we do not have passenger lines reaching them, and the committee thought it would be a great convenience. It has also been shown by testimony before the committee that some men who have gone to foreign ports had been obliged to rely upon the large passenger steamers, and frequently these steamers could not supply the accommodations desired, while they could obtain the accommodation on these freight steamers. In addition to the convenience, it was believed it would save to the commercial traveler a great deal of time, and possibly it would result in an extension of American trade to foreign ports not easily reached by the great steamship lines.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

WATER SUPPLY OF LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 406) amending an act entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Los Angeles, Calif., certain public lands in California; and granting rights in, over, and through the Sierra Forest Reserve, the Santa Barbara Forest Reserve, and the San Gabriel Timberland Reserve, Calif., to the city of Los Angeles, Calif.," approved June 30, 1906.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. GARD. Why does the gentleman ask that it be passed without prejudice?

Mr. OSBORNE. I hope to bring it up in some other parliamentary form.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I objected to the consideration of the bill when it last appeared on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. I have received a number of communications about the matter which I would be pleased to bring to the attention of the gentleman from California. I do not think the bill should be on the calendar. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. OSBORNE. I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CUSTER STATE GAME PARK SANCTUARY, S. DAK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11398) for the creation of the Custer State Park Game Sanctuary, in the State of South Dakota, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I would like to have the bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to designate as the Custer State Park Game Sanctuary such areas, not exceeding 30,000 acres, of the Harney National Forest, and adjoining or in the vicinity of the Custer State Park, in the State of South Dakota, as should, in his opinion, be set aside for the protection of game animals and birds and be recognized as a breeding place therefor.

SEC. 2. That when such areas have been designated as provided for in section 1 of this act, hunting, trapping, killing, or capturing of game animals and birds upon the lands of the United States within the limits of said areas shall be unlawful, except under such regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of Agriculture; and any person violating such regulations or the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction in any United States court of competent jurisdiction, be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000, or be imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or shall suffer both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. That it is the purpose of this act to protect from trespass the public lands of the United States and the game animals and birds which may be thereon, and not to interfere with the operation of the local game laws as affecting private, State, or Territorial lands.

SEC. 4. That the State of South Dakota is hereby authorized and permitted to erect and maintain a good substantial fence, inclosing in whole or in part such areas as may be designated and set aside by the President under the authority of section 1. The State shall erect and maintain such gates in this fence as may be required by the authorized agents of the Federal Government in administering this game sanctuary and the adjoining national forest lands, and may erect and maintain such additional inclosures as may be agreed upon with the Secretary of Agriculture. The right of the State to maintain this fence shall continue so long as the area designated by the President as a game sanctuary is also given similar protection by the laws of the State of South Dakota.

SEC. 5. That upon recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Interior may convey to the State of South Dakota a patent to not to exceed 1,600 acres of national forest lands within the areas set aside by the President under the authority of section 1: Provided, That the State of South Dakota conveys to the Government good and sufficient title to other lands of equal value owned by the State and lying within the exterior boundaries of a national forest in the State of South Dakota and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture as equally desirable for national forest purposes, the lands thus conveyed to the Government to become a part of the national forest: Provided, however, That this authority shall not operate to restrict any selection rights which the State may have or be hereafter granted, excepting as to the specific lands conveyed to the Government under authority of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 16, after the word "private," insert the word "or."

Page 2, line 16, after the word "State," strike out the words "or Territorial."

Page 3, line 7, after the word "may," strike out the word "convey" and insert the word "patent."

Page 3, line 8, after the word "Dakota," insert the words "a patent to."

Page 3, line 9, after the word "of," insert the word "nonmineral."

Page 3, line 10, after the word "lands," insert the words "not otherwise appropriated or withdrawn."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to insert, in line 21, page 3, after the word "or" the word "may." I should like to ask the gentleman from South Dakota if he does not think the language there is a little deficient? It says:

Any selection rights which the State may have or be hereafter granted.

I move to insert the word "may," so that it will read "or may be hereafter granted."

Mr. GANDY. I have no objection to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 3, line 21, after the word "or" insert the word "may."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. GANDY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AQUEDUCT BRIDGE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10328) to amend an act approved May 18, 1916, entitled "An act to provide for the removal of what is known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in the place thereof."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SUBMISSION OF CLAIMS BY INDIAN TRIBES TO COURT OF CLAIMS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 157) authorizing the Indian tribes and individual Indians, or any of them, residing in the State of Washington and west of the summit of the Cascade Mountains to submit to the Court of Claims certain claims growing out of treaties and otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who objected to this measure two weeks ago, suggests that he would like to see the further information that we have secured put in the RECORD. I will ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the statement made by the president of the Northwestern Federation of American Indians dealing with the case, stating the number of Indians and giving facts about the claim, and also a letter from the Secretary of the Interior stating that the department is satisfied with the bill, and certain other information.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his reservation of an objection?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No; but pending that I ask to put these matters in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Reserving the right to object, I notice that there are other bills on the calendar of a similar nature, authorizing certain tribes of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims. Is it necessary that there be a large number of separate bills substantially for the same purpose? Would it not be advisable to have some general law applying to all alike? It seems to me it is a waste of the time of the House and would result in some confusion to have separate bills considered by the House and submitted to take care of claims of each separate tribe of Indians.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. In answer to that suggestion I would say that the policy of the Committee on Indian Affairs is exactly the opposite, because each case arises on a separate treaty and has entirely different conditions. There have been objections time and again to dealing with tribes widely separated in a single bill, and it is deemed best to consider each case by itself.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Is it true that treaties are so drawn that no method is possible by which the Indians can have a proper consideration of their claims?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is absolutely the case here, and only through an act of this kind, where such treaties are involved, can these claims be adjudicated.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman wants to modify that statement a little. These claims are all barred by the statute of limitations. They could have been adjudicated if there was any claim and the claim had been made. Many of them have been adjudicated by the department. Now, they want a chance to come before the Court of Claims, and can not get it because the statute of limitations pleaded against them would shut them out.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. In this bill the San Juan Indians were involved, and both Great Britain and America laid claim to the land. There was no opportunity at that time for a settlement, and there has not been up to this time.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the American Government got the land, as they did, and the Indians had a claim, they would have presented the claim for that land that had been taken away from them. They never thought they had one until some bright attorney, in recent years, concluded that he would dig up the claim.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am sure if the gentleman from Illinois will take the time to go over the real facts he will find that these Indians themselves have some claim on the Government.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am going through the claims.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the bill be passed without prejudice?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to by Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania is as follows:

[Letter from T. G. Bishop, president of the Northwestern Federation of American Indians, to Hon. L. H. HADLEY, Member of Congress, which was presented at the hearing before the Indian Affairs Committee.]

NORTHWESTERN FEDERATION OF AMERICAN INDIANS,
Washington, D. C., August 28, 1919.

Hon. L. H. HADLEY, M. C., City.

DEAR MR. HADLEY: On receipt of yours of July 28 last with a copy of letter from the Secretary of the Interior, and a careful review of my files, I submit the following report, as I think will support the answers to the three questions, required, etc.:

At the time of the making of the treaties, during the years of 1854 and 1855, there was estimated to be forty-one hundred and sixty Indians in the district covering the treaties of the four treaties.

I figure that since that date about 2,000 have been allotted within the four reservations, and, of course, fully compensated.

There are to my figures now, according to an enrollment roughly made by our officers of the federation, 2,321 who wish to have their claims presented to the Court of Claims for adjudication. They may be divided into two classes, viz, reservation, or included with the treaty-making descendants, and nontreaty Indians.

The former are enrolled as follows, including the following unallotted:

Point Elliott treaty:
Skagets	192
Nootsacks	167
Stilaguamish	118
Swinomish	208
Duwamish	141
Muckleshoots	146
Snohomish	194
Snoqualamines	142
Total		1,308
Point-no-Point treaty:
Clallams and allied tribes or bands		493
Quinaielts—
Quinaielts	18
Quileutes	110
Total		128
Medicine Creek treaty:
Nisquallys	116
Puyallups	132
Squaxon Island	42
Total		290
		2,219

The latter (nonreservation) would be:

San Juan Islands Indians	184
Chehalis Indians	238
Total		422

This would be a total of twenty-five hundred and nine Indians who think they have claims against the Government that they wish adjudicated before the proper courts.

I have on two different occasions written the Indian Office for information in regard to amounts unpaid these Indians through treaty agreements, but could get no information on that subject. The treaty agreements called for $267,000, together with the improvements or compensation due them or their ancestors for improvements made by them and which was never settled for. Also for lands taken by the Government after the treaties were agreed upon. On an average, I might say, that about each of these four reservations not more than one-half of the original reserve was kept for the reservation of the different tribes for allotments.

I would figure that the amount involved would be in the neighborhood of one and probably one and one-half millions of dollars. There would be, of course, some "cut-offs"—or the amount already paid by the Government—according to the treaty agreements. This latter I can get no figures on whatever.

The claim of the San Juan Islands Indians, and also the Chehalis Indians, is quite a problem, as the former at the time of treaty making, in the years of 1854 and 1855—this was disputed territory between the British and United States Governments, and as a consequence was never settled with; never could they have access to any of the other reservations, though many attempts have been made by individuals for allotments of lands on three different reservations.

With the Chehalis Indians treaty agreement was never entered into. They ask an allotment of land on the Quinaielt or other reservation or the value of an average allotment of land as given other Indians in their district. About 50 of these (Chehalis) Indians have taken advantage of the Indian allotment act, and this would have to be adjudicated by the courts as to their rights for claim.

The average quantity of land ceded by western Washington Indians during these treaty agreements was 1,800 acres each, and the average tracts if reserved according to treaty agreements would be about 7½ acres each.

First, the "nature of our claim" is based upon treaty agreements as stipulated in our bill, H. R. 2846, or for the value as found by the courts authorized in the adjustments therein.

Second, that where Indians were forced to move on to the reservations and surrender their improvements—crops and stock—that they or their legal heirs should have been paid according to the then agreements.

Third, that repatriation should be had for lands taken from the agreed reservations, where taken without the consent of the Indians affected.

Hoping this will be satisfactory as a reply, but, in the event that more enlightenment in the case may be needed, I am at your pleasure, at any moment.

Thanking you in advance, I am, as ever,

Faithfully, yours,

THOMAS G. BISHOP.

[Letter from the Secretary of the Interior to Hon. G. W. EDMONDS, Member of Congress, chairman of the Claims Committee, to which the bill was referred upon its introduction.]

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 25, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. EDMONDS: I am in receipt of your letters of June 26 and July 10, 1919, requesting information with respect to the amount of money, the number of Indians involved, and the nature of the claims of the Indian tribes residing west of the summit of the Cascade Mountains, Wash.

In answer you are advised that the Indian Bureau informs me that it has no definite knowledge of the nature of the claim, amount of money, or number of Indians involved. However, it may be inferred from the nature of the treaties referred to in the bill, H. R. 2846, that their claims would be for money or land they believe they are entitled to under the treaties.

In all such cases I am of opinion that where Indian tribes believe they have meritorious claims against the Government they should be allowed an opportunity to have such claims properly investigated and adjudicated, notwithstanding the fact that they may not, at the time of asking for legislative authority to permit them to do so, have made a prima facie showing setting out the amount of their claims.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Hon. GEORGE W. EDMONDS,
Chairman Committee on Claims,
House of Representatives.

[Statement by Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, E. B. Meritt, before the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs at hearing on measure.]

We have had the claims of the Washington Indians looked into, and we have a representative now in the State of Washington making an investigation of these various matters. We expect to have a report from that representative in the office within the next two months, which we hope will be a complete résumé of the conditions existing among those Indians in the State of Washington. However, the only practicable way, and the only conclusive way, in my judgment, is to authorize the Indians to go into the Court of Claims under a properly worded jurisdictional act which will authorize the Indians to submit their claims against the Government and which should also authorize the United States to interpose any set-offs or counterclaims against those Indians.

[Statement of Judge Arthur E. Griffin, attorney at law, Seattle, Wash., at hearing before Senate committee.]

Our claims would be principally for money which was promised to these Indians under treaties—$150,000 under one treaty and about $45,000 under another—and the treaties further provided that they would reimburse these Indians for the improvements upon the lands which they should vacate. I have not been able to get definite information from the Indian Office, but as near as I can find out, nothing whatsoever has been paid these Indians for the improvements upon the lands which were taken away from them. The early reports of the office show that nearly all these Indians had little farms, little potato patches, and when the early settlers came to Puget Sound they were able to buy potatoes from the Indians and help them until such time as they got started with their farms, and when logging camps started they were able to get potatoes from the Indians, and the Indians sold enough of the potatoes which they raised to buy their clothing and implements which they needed in their work.

As I say, as far as I can ascertain, nothing whatever has been paid to those Indians for those improvements, and I can not find that any considerable amount of money that was promised in these treaties has ever been paid. There are a number of tribes that never treated with the Government at all. The white settler simply went in and selected the best land and crowded the Indians out to a space or a piece of land that was not attractive enough to the settlers to have them take it away from them, under the promise that the Great Father would reimburse them at some time for their land, and they have been there 62 years, and have never received anything whatsoever. Those Indians who did receive small annuities would travel long distances in their canoes, 75 miles or more, to the place where the annuities were distributed, and when they got there probably a family of Indians would receive a little flour or a few yards of calico, but nothing which would compensate them for the expense of making the trip. So after a short time they ceased to visit the place where they knew it was to be distributed.

My idea is that in making these treaties Gov. Stevens, who made the five treaties, promised these Indians at least sufficient land for a home, but when the treaties were finally made there was not sufficient land reserved for the estimated number of Indians living at that time, although he had promised them all homes, but had only reserved land enough to give them 7.05 acres apiece, which you know is not sufficient ground for an Indian home.

After the treaties were made Congress, by Executive order, set apart other land by treaties; so if it was all allotted to the Indians now they would have about 59 acres apiece. But the trouble is that some of that land—a greater portion of it—is in the Quinaielt Reservation—ground which is not agricultural land, but is covered with big timber. The Government claims the right to sell that timber first. So it has left a lot of these Indians without any allotment of land at all; and my idea in having the bill drawn in the way it was was to give those Indians an opportunity to claim allotments, or the value of allotments, and that would be such Indians who had never been able to procure an allotment of land. Such right would be in addition to the rights of the tribe generally to claim for the failure of the Government to pay the amount stipulated in the treaties.

Now, at the time these treaties were made the Oregon donation act was in effect. They were then giving to a single white man a half section of land and to a married man and his wife a full section of land in Oregon and Washington Territory, and those Indians ceded an average of 1,800 acres apiece; while the Government promised to give them their homes—not directly promising to give them allotments, but saying that the President might, when in his judgment the interests of the Indians would be advanced, they might allot to these Indians in severalty, giving the Indians allotments in accordance with the sixth section of the treaty with the Omahas.

The sixth section of the Omahas treaty provided for an 80-acre allotment for the individual Indians. Those Indians knew nothing of land measurements and knew nothing of the 80-acre provision of the Omahas treaty. The treaties were explained to them in Chinook jargon—there were eight different languages spoken in this country west of the Cascade Mountains. The Chinook jargon was invented by Capt. Cook, and it was later used by the Hudson Bay Co. in their intercourse with the Indians. It is composed of a very limited number of words, and the history of making these treaties was that the treaties were prepared and taken up there, but no arrangement made by the Indians when they were up there, and Gov. Stevens made his talk and gave away presents bought in New York and Boston. The settlers were taking away their land, and they saw no other way of doing it, and they signed those treaties, believing that they would be allotted 80 acres of land, while instead of that they only received 7.05 acres of land, and many of them were pushed aside from where they had taken their homes; and I may say that the reports show that many of those homes had substantial buildings, from 30 to 100 feet long, and well built, as appears by the early reports; and they have since been pushed aside and have gotten nothing.

SALE OF CUSTOMHOUSE BUILDING AT KENNEBUNKPORT, ME.

The next business on the Calendar for Uuanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11175) authorizing the public sale of customhouse building and site at Kennebunkport, Me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice that the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury that recommends the legislation permits the sale of a number of abandoned buildings for which the Government had no further use. Why has the committee picked out one particular building and reported on it?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I am on the committee that reported the bill, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. GOODALL], the author of the bill, asked me to explain it. In answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the reason why the committee acted on this bill was because a bill came before the committee for this purpose, and no bill has ever been introduced up to this time as to the other buildings. As I understand, this little piece of land and building was used in Kennebunkport for years as a customhouse. It was abandoned years ago for that purpose. The Government has been allowing the Library Association of Kennebunkport, Me., to use this for a number of years for a public library. The town of Kennebunkport would like to buy the land and building for this purpose. The Government has no further use for it and, if you will notice the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it recommends that the bill be passed and that the land be sold and the money turned into the Treasury.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If there should be any competition at this sale and somebody buys the land, what would become of the public library?

Mr. ELLIOTT. They would have to get out, I suppose. I do not know whether anybody else wants it or not. It is a very small piece of land, only 124 by 40.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Was it represented in the committee that the town desires to buy it as a site for a library?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to sell at public sale the present customhouse building and site at Kennebunkport, Me., after proper advertisement, and at such time and upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the United States, to execute and deliver to the purchaser the usual quitclaim deed therefor, and to deposit the proceeds derived from such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. ELLIOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER, MONTAGUE COUNTY, TEX.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12160) authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River at a point a little east of north of Nocona, in Montague County, Tex.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Nocona Red River Bridge Co., a corporation, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation on the south bank of Red River at a point a little east of due north of Nocona, in Montague County, to a point approximately north of said beginning and located in Jefferson County, Okla., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "County," insert the word "Texas."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PARRISH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS COLUMBIA RIVER, WASH.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12164) to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Columbia River between the towns of Pasco and Kennewick, in the State of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill proposes to grant to private individuals the right to construct a bridge. That is done at times, and I think there is one more bill on the calendar like this. Usually there is some explanation why a private individual seeks an opportunity to sell a permit to construct a bridge. I take it that that is what it is, that it is speculative. I do not know, but there is no information in the report upon the subject. If some one wants to construct a bridge where it is needed, very well, but it has not been the practice of Congress to grant to private individuals the right to construct a bridge as a speculative proposition.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, the two counties that are directly concerned have each granted a franchise for the construction of this bridge.

The bill was introduced at the suggestion and the request of the county commissioners of those two counties. This is to supplant to a degree a ferry which is the only means by which the Columbia River can be crossed in that part of the State.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The county on each side of the river has already granted authority to Charles G. Huber to construct this bridge?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Charles G. Huber, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, be, and he or they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Columbia River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, such bridge to extend from the east bank of said river adjacent to the town of Pasco, Wash., at a point not more than 2 miles upstream from the Northern Pacific Railway bridge across said river, to a point on the west bank of said river adjacent to the town of Kennewick, Wash., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SUMMERS of Washington, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE CONNECTICUT RIVER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11756) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Connecticut River between Springfield and West Springfield in Hampden County, Mass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—will the gentleman in charge of the bill state whether it is in proper form to extend the time of construction, inasmuch as the time of construction has already expired? Is the present bill a proper bill, all of the time extended on previous authorizations having now expired?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, this has been the practice for years. I say that, having formerly been a member of this committee.

Mr. GARD. I would be very glad to have the word of the gentleman from Illinois. I merely want to be satisfied upon the point. I should think the ordinary practice would be to extend before the time the previous authorization had expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is as the ordinary practice, but frequently it is not extended until after the time for the construction of the bridge has expired. That gives the authority, however.

Mr. GARD. It would seem to me that the term "extension" itself would mean the carrying on further of the authority already conferred, and when that time had expired the proper practice would be the introduction of a new bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This extends the time for commencing the work from the time when the right would otherwise have elapsed instead of a year from the present date.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for comencing and completing the construction of a bridge, authorized by act of Congress approved August 25, 1916, to be built across the Connecticut River between the city of Springfield and the town of West Springfield, in Hampden County, Mass., are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments, which were severally reported and severally agreed to:

Line 3, correct the spelling of the word "commencing."

Line 9, strike out the words "date of approval hereof" and insert the words "27th day of February, 1920."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WINGO, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS BIG NESTUCCA RIVER, OREG.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12213) authorizing F. R. Beals to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Big Nestucca River in Tillamook County, Oreg.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know about this matter in which it is proposed to grant a franchise to individuals.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is to connect a small town called Pacific City on the north bank of the river with the south bank, so that the people who live on the north bank can cross the river and get to the ocean beach on the south bank. It is a summer resort.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand; but why are we asked to grant this right to an individual? Does he expect to build the bridge?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Or is it for speculative purposes?

Mr. HAWLEY. He expects to build the bridge. He owns land on both sides of the river and expects to build a bridge to accommodate people who may live in that section, and I suppose for the benefit of his own interests in connection with the land he owns on both sides of the river.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby granted to F. R. Beals and his successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Big Nestucca River, in Tillamook County, Oreg., connecting the northerly part of lot 1 with the northerly part of lot 10, in section 30, township 4 south, range 10 west, Willamette meridian, in Oregon, and at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think that amendment ought not to be agreed to. The bill provided that F. R. Beals and his assigns have the right. Now, the committee proposes that F. R. Beals or his assigns have the right to construct and maintain, and so forth. Now, "or" is an alternative and does not give the right to both. Either one can do it, and if Mr. Beals constructs the bridge and afterwards sells it his assigns would not maintain it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I accept the gentleman's judgment as to that and ask that the amendment be voted down.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "successors" and insert "assigns."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "Big."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing F. R. Beals to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Nestucca River, in Tillamook County, Oreg."

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey. one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on February 28, 1920, approved and signed bills of the following titles:

H. R. 8819. An act to amend the Army appropriation act for 1920 and for the purchase of land and to provide for construction work at certain military posts, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 10453. An act to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) authorizing the appointment of a commission to confer with the Dominion Government or the provincial governments of Quebec, Ontario, and New Brunswick as to certain restrictive orders in council of the said Provinces relative to the exportation of pulp wood therefrom to the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

NATIONAL SCREW THREAD COMMISSION.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 299, extending the life of the National Screw Thread Commission for a period of two years from March 21, 1920.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the life of the National Screw Thread Commission, created by an act approved July 18, 1918, as amended by an act approved March 3, 1919, be, and the same is hereby, extended for an additional period of two years from March 21, 1920.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the word "life," in line 3, page 1, and insert the word "term."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 1, line 3, strike out the word "life" and insert in lieu thereof the word "term."

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman any objection to that?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is that amendment proposed because this is a dead concern?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. Consent was granted.

Mr. TILSON. It is not dead, but it is not active in the sense it has been heretofore.

Mr. GARD. Was the gentleman's amendment to strike out the word "life" and insert the word "term"? There was no term——

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GARD. What was the term?

Mr. WALSH. Its term was to expire, I think——

Mr. TILSON. March 21, 1920.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Its term expired in 1918.

Mr. TILSON. It was extended one year.

Mr. WALSH. The commission originally created was to expire, I think, in June, 1918, and then it was extended, and now it is to expire March 21 of this year, and now we are extending the term.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman explain——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut who engineered this.

Mr. TILSON. The provision in the original act was that it should last six months from the time of the appointment of the commission. The commission was finally appointed on September 21, 1918, therefore it would have expired on March 21, 1919, had it not been extended for the period of one year from March 21, 1919.

Mr. GARD. Would it not meet the same purpose if we provided that the National Screw Thread Commission, and so forth, be extended without the use either of the word "life" or the word "term"?

Mr. TILSON. Any way to serve the purpose will suit me. What is wanted is for the commission to remain in existence for certain purposes for as much as two years more.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF THE KLAMATH TRIBE OF INDIANS.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5163) authorizing the Klamath Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PENSION TO SOLDIERS OF THE WAR WITH SPAIN.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 2, with committee amendment, a bill to pension soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition, and move to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from its further consideration, and pass the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to suspend the rules, to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration, and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2) to pension soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition.

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or who may hereafter be suffering from any mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which so incapacities them from the performance of manual labor as to render them unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact, according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $30 per month and not less than $12 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support; and in determining such inability each and every infirmity shall be duly considered, and the aggregate of the disabilities shown be rated, and such pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application in the Bureau of Pensions, after the passage of this act, upon proof that the disability or disabilities then existed, and shall continue during the existence of the same: Provided, That any such person who has reached the age of 62 years shall, upon making proof of such fact, be placed upon the pension roll and entitled to receive a pension of $12 per month. In case such person has reached the age of 72 years, $24 per month; and in case such person has reached the age of 75 years, $30 per month: Provided further, That persons who are now receiving pensions under existing laws, or whose claims are pending in the Bureau of Pensions, may, by application to the Commissioner of Pensions, in such form as he may prescribe, showing themselves entitled thereto, receive the benefits of this act; and nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any pensioner thereunder from prosecuting his claim and receiving his pension under any other general or special act: Provided, however, That no person shall receive more than one pension for the same period: And provided further, That rank in the service shall not be considered in applications filed under this act.

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $20, and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or who shall wrongfully withhold from a pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500, or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SELLS] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CARSS] to 20 minutes.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who speak on the bill may have the right to extend and revise their remarks for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all Members who speak on the bill may have unanimous consent to extend and revise their remarks for five days. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, this bill is presented to the House from the Committee on Pensions with the approval of its entire membership. It furthermore has the unqualified indorsement of the legislative committee of the United Spanish War Veterans and of the various branches of that organization in practically every State in the Union. It seeks to confer on this class of our soldiers the same benefits that were secured for the Civil War veterans by the act of June 27, 1890. That law was the first piece of legislation that gave to the Federal soldier a pension for disabilities other than those directly traceable to Army service. In this bill the verbiage of that act, and the rules for its administration, have been followed as closely as practicable in order that no delays might be necessary in its construction.

It goes, however, one step further than the act of 1890, in that it creates a pensionable status for all honorably discharged soldiers of the Spanish War who have attained the age of 62 years. In other words, it assumes that disabilities incident to that age shall entitle the soldier to receive a pension at the rate of $12 per month. If he has reached the age of 68 years, $18 per month; of 72 years, $24 per month; and of 75 years, $30 per month. For disabilities, no matter how incurred, he shall receive a pension of not less than $12 and not more than $30 per month, based upon the extent of the disability from which he may be suffering.

All kinds of criticisms have been directed against the rates proposed in this bill. To some they have appeared too high, to others too low. To the latter class I would answer that the disability rates which this bill proposes, compared to the act of June, 1890, are double the minimum and two and a half times the maximum. The rates for age approximate those fixed by the act of May 11, 1912. And it must be remembered that this bill seeks to in no way interfere with the right of a soldier to file a claim for pension under the general law for disabilities actually incurred in line of duty, upon making satisfactory proof of which he may receive a pension as high as $72 per month.

To those who would criticize these rates on the ground that they are higher than those granted in 1890 to our Civil War soldiers I would say that relatively they are no higher, and certainly their purchasing power no greater. In reporting this bill the committee has sought to do only substantial justice. We have tried to show no favoritism as against any other class of our soldiers. We merely seek to give to these the same status and the same rewards that we have generously accorded to others who have nobly served their country. [Applause.]

As one of the Committee on Pensions during the nine years that I have been a Member of Congress, I have recognized the necessity, as well as the justice, of granting to the Spanish War soldier more liberal treatment. Thousands of them, stricken by disease and unable to earn a living, are supported by charity and the contributions of their former comrades. In New York City alone last year the various Spanish War organizations contributed more than $200,000 for the relief of their diseased and penniless members. Their cry of distress comes up from every city and practically every community. Thousands of them, unable to prove their diseases of service origin, have had their claims rejected by the Bureau of Pensions, and are dependent upon charity for a miserable existence. I think no fair-minded man will deny that this is a condition that demands and deserves remedial legislation by Congress. In enacting it we are not bestowing gratuities or granting charities. We are merely paying an honest debt and discharging a national obligation. [Applause.]

The cost of administering this legislation would be small. In answer to a request for an estimate of probable expenditures as a result of such a law, the Bureau of Pensions advises me that its maximum cost during the first year of its enactment would not exceed $2,000,000, and at no time would it exceed $15,000,000. I ask leave to extend my remarks by inserting this letter as a part of my remarks:

JULY 16, 1919.

Probable cost of the bill (H. R. 2) to pension soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition for the first three years, should it become a law, as ascertained by comparison with results of the first three years under the act of June 27, 1890: The bill follows the invalid provision of said act, except that the maximum and minimum rates are $30 and $12 per month, as against $12 and $6 per month under the act, which would make the cost of the bill per pensioner somewhat more than double.

The number of men engaged in the War with Spain, etc., was about one-seventh the number engaged in the Civil War, the estimated numbers being 312,000 and 2,213,365, respectively.

The results for the first three years under the act of June 27, 1890, in numbers of invalids on the roll at the close of the years and the totals paid each year are as follows:

	Number of pensioners.	Total paid.
1891	101,112	$7,812,107.65
1892	293,068	43,845,071.02
1893	377,203	54,568,610.16

Taking one-seventh of the number of pensioners and two-sevenths of the amount paid in each year as approximating the cost of the bill in the first three years after enactment, the results are as follows:

	Number of pensioners.	Total paid.
First year	14,445	$2,232,630.76
Second year	41,867	12,527,163.14
Third year	53,886	15,591,031.48

On January 5 this body passed the Fuller bill for the further relief and protection of the Civil War soldier. I was glad to support it, believing that these aged veterans, by the suffering and sacrifices of four long years of bloody warfare, had fully earned it. It will not be for long. The Grand Army of the Republic will soon exist only in the hearts and memories of their countrymen. They are on the last lap of the march. The drums are muffled and taps will quickly sound. The campaign has nearly ended and they are about to taste the fruits of their final victory, eternal and complete.

But I am none the less glad to support this bill. I am proud to plead the cause of a soldier who, though perhaps less renowned, was none the less faithful in the discharge of a sacred trust. [Applause.] Whether facing the Spaniard in Cuba and Porto Rico, or attacking the Filipino under a tropical sun in the land of the jungle, he upheld the traditions of the American soldier and added to the imperishable glory of American arms. [Applause.] His efforts forever destroyed in the Western Hemisphere the last vestige of autocratic rule. They added to the flag of the world's republics another star, which, though small, is brightly shining. To 8,000,000 people in the Orient they carried the blessings of just and beneficent government and a guaranty of civil and religious liberty. I maintain that in the same length of time no American Army has every accomplished more. [Applause.] And so I am proud to present this bill for his relief, so justly and so fully earned, and urge its prompt and favorable consideration. The time has come to discharge in part, at least, this debt of gratitude, and I submit this bill to this House in the belief that it will do its full duty. [Applause.]

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. SELLS. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I do not wish to take up the time. I will state it has often been a source of wonder to me that we have not had this legislation in behalf of the Spanish War veterans. It ought to be passed. But why is the language "manual labor" in there? Is there any reason why you state that they shall be incapable of manual labor, or is that construed to mean any character of labor?

Mr. SELLS. Any character of labor, as I understand it. As I just stated, the language of this act follows almost identically the language of the act of June, 1890, in its application to Civil War soldiers.

Mr. BEE. There would not be anything in the bill that would exclude from its operation any man disabled, although he was in any other occupation than that which called for manual labor?

Mr. SELLS. No.

Mr. FOCHT. On page 2, line 4, I see that the maximum allowed there is $30 a month. Now, that would mean that a totally disabled Spanish-American War soldier, whether he had his legs off or his arms off, or had tuberculosis, could never draw, by any means, more than $30 a month?

Mr. SELLS. No. It does not necessarily mean that. It means that he shall receive that rate in the event those disabilities are of other than service origin. If a soldier can show that his disabilities are the result of disease that he incurred while actually in the service of his country, he may receive a pension as high as $72 per month, or in case of total blindness $100 a month. This bill seeks in no way to limit his right to file under the general law for diseases of service origin.

Mr. FOCHT. Attention has been called to the fact that totally disabled soldiers under the war-risk insurance act may have $80, and the question naturally arises why a Spanish War soldier who is totally disabled may not have that maximum of $80?

Mr. SELLS. A soldier of the World War is not entitled to any pension or compensation whatever unless his disabilities are traceable to his service. This bill grants a pension to the Spanish War soldier for disabilities not contracted in line of duty.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; but he has a privilege that the Spanish War soldier does not have—the war-risk insurance. The Spanish War soldier for overseas service receives $15 as compared with the allowance made to the World War soldier.

Mr. SELLS. That is true, but the gentleman must remember that the minimum rate fixed in this bill is twice as high and the maximum rate is two and one-half times as high as the pension that was granted to the Civil War soldier 25 years after that war closed.

Mr. FOCHT. Of course the ordinary answer to that would be that the purchasing power of the dollar which he then received was just double what it is now. Would the gentleman object to an amendment to be offered here to raise that maximum to $50 instead of $30?

Mr. SELLS. I will say to the gentleman that this bill is being considered under suspension of the rules and amendment is not in order.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. OGDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether his committee has considered a provision for the benefit of the widows of deceased soldiers?

Mr. SELLS. We have. And later on the committee expects to report out a bill removing certain limitations.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption for just a minute? I think the gentleman stated it in his speech, but I did not catch it. How much will this bill cause appropriations to be increased; that is, how much of an appropriation will be necessary?

Mr. SELLS. According to an estimate given by Mr. Saltzgaber, the Commissioner of Pensions, for the first year $2,200,000 and for the third year, I believe, $15,500,000.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield to an inquiry?

Mr. SELLS. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I notice in lines 12 to 15, page 2, it provides that the soldiers who are now drawing pensions or whose claims are pending must make a formal application in order to get the benefits of this act. Do you think it fair to impose upon the soldiers the necessity of making a formal application for the benefits of the law? Many of them may not be advised of its enactment.

Mr. SELLS. All soldiers have to make application for pension. Now, I can not yield further.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to use five minutes.

Mr. Speaker, "in times of peace prepare for war" is a familiar quotation, but I much prefer to believe that in times of peace it is our duty to, in slight measure, take care of those who during the time of war bore the brunt of the burden.

History deals much with war, but as a rule it deals only with that part concerning the actual battle, the clash of arms, and the numbers of dead and wounded. It devotes little space to the details of preparation, the long days of the training period, or the toil, the hardships, and the sickness which abound in the concentration camps preceding the time of actual battle.

In support of the measure now under consideration, Mr. Speaker, I intend to confine my remarks to the subject of the inroads upon the health of the men who served during the Spanish-American War, brought about by the conditions of their service, conditions for which the Government that asked for that service is to blame.

Most of us can remember the call of 1898 and how the patriotic young men from every walk of life, from every city, village, and hamlet, presented themselves to the recruiting offices. The number called for was not large in proportion to those eligible for service, and as a consequence the medical officers had much material to pick from, so much so, in fact, that the physical standard set for the volunteers of 1898 was the highest of any army that has ever gone forth in defense of a nation's honor in all history.

And well that it was so. Without that high physical standard as a basis the mortality rate among these men who had so gallantly offered their services to the Government would have been far greater than it was, and Heaven knows it was high enough. Concentrated in camps in the Southern States or sent to the tropical climes of Cuba, clothed in woolen when the coolest of linen should have been worn, fed on greasy bacon and hard-tack when fruits and vegetables should have been the diet, it is no wonder they were an easy prey to dysentery and various kinds of fever. No wonder, Mr. Speaker, that these men returned to the northern demobilization camps after that service mere physical wrecks, with pinched and drawn faces and with yellow skin drawn over gaunt skeleton frames. No wonder, Mr. Speaker, that this entire Army registered an average loss in weight of 26 pounds per man during their period of service.

Mr. Speaker, the Nation was startled during the winter of 1917 by charges of neglect and lack of accommodation in the hospitals at the training camps throughout the country; but, sir, figures prepared by Surg. Gen. Gorgas show that among the approximately million and a half Regulars, National Guardsmen, and National Army who had been in camp for the preceding five months, the deaths from disease alone were at the rate of 8 per 1,000, while during the five months of the War with Spain, from disease alone in the camps of the United States, the death rate was 25 in every 1,000.

It is hard at this late day to say just whether it was the jungles of Cuba, the rice swamps of the Philippines, or the fever-stricken camps in the United States that did more to destroy the health of the soldiers of that period, but this I know, Mr. Speaker, and so does every man within the sound of my voice, that very, very few came back from that service in good health. I know, and all of you know, that for months and months after discharge thousands of those men were unable to perform manual labor, and that when at last their health was in a measure restored they were still left in such condition as to be an easy prey to ailments which normally should have been shaken off.

Mr. Speaker, the pension law as it stands to-day requires these soldiers to furnish absolute proof that the disability under which they claim pension is of service origin. I state to the House now, after my experience on the Pensions Committee, after examination of numerous claims turned down by the Bureau of Pensions, that there are thousands of cases of physical disability of greater or less degree which, to my mind, are the result of military service in which the claimant has no possible chance of submitting the indubitable proofs now required.

That is the reason I supported this bill in committee, and it is the reason I am supporting it now. It is more liberal in its terms than the general law, and it does away with the necessity of showing that disability is of service origin.

This bill merely extends to the veteran who served during the period from 1898 to 1902 the principles of Government aid in case of disability and in case of old age that have been indorsed time and again in the Halls of Congress and by the voters of the country as applied to soldiers of other wars.

Those who will benefit by this act are worthy in every sense. They responded nobly to the country's call, and freely and willingly took oath to serve with the colors until their services were no longer needed, no matter what period of time that might mean. Now that they are ailing, now that they are aging, it is our duty to prove to them and to those who will emulate them in the future that republics are not ungrateful, and that if misfortune overtakes them a generous Government will aid them because of the sacrifices they have made. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I thank you.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MACCRATE). The gentleman has consumed six minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, this is the most important measure that has ever been introduced on this subject, and I think, in order to show our fair treatment of the soldiers who fought in Cuba, in the Philippines, and in China, we should not shut off the discussion on each side. I ask unanimous consent that there may be an extension of 15 minutes to each side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time to be allowed in the debate on this bill be extended 15 minutes on each side. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have more than that. There is no other such important bill on the calendar to-day as this. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended 30 minutes on a side. There are a number of gentlemen here who wish to speak.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, 15 minutes additional will be enough for each side.

Mr. DYER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, what is the gentleman's request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that 15 minutes additional be allowed to the gentlemen in control of the time on this bill on each side. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. How much time will that be altogether?

Mr. LITTLE. That will be 1 hour and 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. This is a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, as I understand it. How much debate is there altogether?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Seventy minutes, 35 minutes to a side.

Mr. CANNON. I mean without this extension.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirty-five minutes to a side.

Mr. CANNON. Will it pass the bill any earlier and give the soldiers of the War with Spain any more, or will it enable some of us who want time to just talk? [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be ordinary courtesy to the men who fought in Cuba, the Philippines, and in China to allow a little more of debate on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas that 15 minutes more be allowed to those in control of the time on each side?

There was no objection.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE] five minutes.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, this bill sheds a ray of light upon a period in our history that has been all but obscured by the greater brilliancy of the periods preceding and subsequent. The Spanish-American soldiers came on to the field, performed a remarkable service, but in so short a time and with such slight casualties that the pomp and circumstance that ordinarily environ a victorious Army has been reduced to a minimum. The splendid results of the service and sacrifice of that volunteer Army must not be wholly swallowed up by the heroic achievements of other days. [Applause.]

Ever since the separation of the human family and the organization of different nations down to the present time heroism has been largely measured by the degree of valor displayed upon the field of battle. Patriotism meant bravery in belligerent struggle. As a result the Old World has almost continually trembled beneath the measured tread of the battling hordes, and the streams have run red with the lifeblood of millions of strong men, to the extent that the history of the world is largely but a record of its wars and he the greatest patriot and most loudly lauded hero who left the widest wake of wreck and ruin in his relentless sway.

I should hail with delight the time when the agencies of civilization shall have so far progressed as that enthusiasm for the principles of peace shall be considered a higher compliment to the patriotism of the people than heroism in the prosecution of war.

But all wars have not been fought in vain. Neither have they been unjustifiable. It is true that civilization oft has followed in the wake of war. Great crises are common to every great nation and almost universally have been attended by war. Up to the beginning of the late World War this Nation had passed through at least three great crises. The first was the revolutionary crisis or the war for independence. The second was the civil crisis or the war for freedom and nationality, and the third the Spanish-American crisis or the war for humanity. [Applause.]

God forbid that I say aught that shall have a tendency to pluck one single star from the crown of glory that bedecks the brow of all who took part in them, but I am persuaded that not the least of these is humanity.

The close of the Civil War soon witnessed the reconstruction of the States. Once more we were at peace with ourselves and all the world. Our attention was withdrawn from the operations of war and devoted to the pursuits of peace. New telegraphic and cable lines were extended, new railroads constructed, and great steamers plowed the ocean's waves far and near, bringing us into such close contact and communication with the rest of the world that the ignorance and superstition, heathendom, and debauchery that existed in some parts, not only remote but adjacent, could no longer be heedlessly regarded. The tyrannical and barbaric conduct of the Spaniards toward the helpless, hapless inhabitants of our neighboring islands became a veritable stench in the nostrils of our advanced civilization. President McKinley made a call for troops to fight, not for individual power or prestige, not for personal aggrandizement or glory, not in self-defense, not for the maintenance of the Union, but in the interest and for the welfare and well-being of humanity. That call was answered by almost every able-bodied man within the limits of the Nation, manifesting the high state of civilization and patriotic devotion to which our people had attained.

The war was short but decisive, and this Nation was awakened from the lethargies of an isolated people and assumed the responsibilities of a great world power. In the far-off benighted Philippines, where the effulgent sunshine of the higher civilization and governmental restraints had seldom, if ever, penetrated, the benign emblem of national authority and morality was unfurled and the beautiful isles of the sunrise seas witnessed the glorious dawn of a great new day. And Cuba, Pearl of the Antilles, rich in natural resources, and resplendent in perennial verdure, with a populace having capacity for advancement. yet where misery and suffering, death, destitution, and despair stalked unrestrained under the eaves of the great structure of our boasted civilization, was set free, and from then until now her star of destiny has been rising higher and higher and growing brighter and brighter in the constellation of nations.

The close of the Civil War soon witnessed the reconstruction of the States, but the bitter emotions of civil strife still lingered to mar the tranquil relations between North and South. We had, indeed, but one flag, but there had been no common sacrifice for its maintenance. There is no agency in all the world that will so readily and thoroughly unite a people in a common cause as to make common sacrifice for that cause. I am persuaded that there is no tie that binds so closely and genuinely as that of military comradeship, or any condition or circumstance where human life is offered upon a common altar. When the call came for our people to fight against the inhumanities of the Spanish domain, they knew no North, no South, no East, no West; but the sons and grandsons of the loyal blue clasped hands with those of the gallant gray, and shoulder to shoulder, to the wild, grand music of war, beneath the folds of the Stars and Stripes, marched away and offered themselves a living sacrifice upon the altar of humanity and for the preservation of the dignity and honor of our common country. Thus in common sacrifice was the healing balm applied, and to-day we recognize one flag and one Nation united and inseparable.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, in the light of these facts I submit to you that in my humble judgment the men comprehended in this bill, most of them now beyond the meridian of life, having manifested the presence of the heroic spirit of the fathers and having to their credit such marvelous achievements, are deserving of even greater consideration than is provided in this bill, and I beseech its speedy enactment into law. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time may be extended, so that the gentleman may ask his question and so that I may ask a question.

Mr. DYER. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this bill.

Mr. WALSH. I will object to that. We have given that right to those who speak on the bill, and that is enough.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects to the request.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] such time as he may desire.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], I approve of this legislation and wish to indicate my assent to it and to summarize very briefly the reasons which lead me to vote for it.

The pending bill liberalizes existing law. The Spanish War veteran is to-day pensioned under general law, by the terms of which he must connect his present disability with his service to acquire pensionable status. The minimum rate granted under this general law is $6 per month, and under the rating of disabilities followed by the department many soldiers and sailors receive only this pittance, and few are allowed more than $17 per month.

This bill proposes that all persons who have served more than 90 days in the military or naval service during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition, and have been honorably discharged, and who are now or may hereafter be suffering from disabilities of a permanent character, shall be placed on the pension-rolls and be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $30 per month and not less than $12 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support; and with the committee amendment adopted that a veteran shall be entitled to the minimum pension of $12 per month on reaching the age of 62 years without proof of disability and thereafter a rate of pension based upon age until on arriving at 75 years of age the pensioner will draw $30 per month.

The significant changes from existing law are that in the case of those who served more than 90 days proof of disability originating in the service is not required; in the increase of the minimum to $12 per month; and in the provision granting a pension at the age of 62 years, and thereafter a graduated rate, without regard to disability.

The bill has my support. The Spanish War soldier, paid $15.60 a month, hurriedly mobilized, poorly equipped and supplied, his rations consisting principally of salt pork, embalmed beef, and hardtack, successfully invaded tropical strongholds of intrenched, acclimated regulars in both hemispheres, destroyed two fleets without the loss by capture of a man, boat, gun, or inch of ground. He fought to triumphant conclusion a war great in its consequences to our country and to humanity. He freed islands at our very shore from centuries of tyranny and oppression; he carried the flag to the far Pacific and the blessings of ordered government and civil liberty to the benighted peoples of far-off lands; and he gave to America a new and dominating position among the nations of the earth. These men are now for the most part of middle age, with family and financial obligations resting heavily upon them. If we are ever to show appreciation for their services and their sacrifices, we should do so now; it will never be more needed and more welcome. I bespeak for this legislation the votes of all Members of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. I will ask the gentleman from Maine the question which I wished to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. Is it not a fact that the veterans of the Civil War, whether they were injured in the service or have incurred disability since, now receive age-service pensions, even though they incurred no disability in the service?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. And also is it not a fact that able Members of this House have made appeals on this floor for pensions for the aged, for men and women, who were never in any war; and is it not a fact that the only reason why this was not seriously considered was on account of the occurrence of the great World War?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I can answer the gentleman's first question in the affirmative, but I am not able to answer his second question.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELTY].

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I can not agree with my good friend from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], for I shall vote for this measure.

The Spanish War veterans have waited over 21 years before they asked any assistance for the soldiers of that war who are suffering from disability. They waited because they felt that their widows and children should come first. The measure providing for pension for their widows passed the House during the Sixty-second, Sixty-third, and Sixty-fourth Congresses, but each time failed in the Senate. Finally, during the Sixty-fifth Congress the Senate passed the same, and shortly thereafter it passed the House and became a law, June 16, 1918. Under this law the widows now receive $12 per month.

The present bill provides a pension not to exceed $30 per month nor less than $12 per month to all persons who served 90 days or more during the war. The pensionable status depends upon his disability.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is now more than 22 years since the startling report came over the wires of the sinking of the Maine. In April following that event over 300,000 of our boys, at the request of President McKinley, volunteered to enter the military service of the Government of the United States, although they knew when they volunteered that their service would take them to yellow-fever-stricken districts. As a result of that service thousands of them are now suffering disabilities, though they are not all able to trace those disabilities directly to that service. Ninety per cent of the boys during that service were probably sick and had hospital records. They were sent home under disability. They were treated by physicians at home, and can not trace their present condition directly to their former military service. Shall it be said, because they are not able to trace their disability back to that time, although they then contracted the germs of the disease, that they shall not receive any pensions because of that? Thousands of them to-day are languishing in charitable hospitals, suffering from tuberculosis. Thousands of them are suffering from other disabilities, which the doctors will probably pronounce to be the result of their service either in Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, or in the camps of the States, where they suffered from conditions which were no fault of theirs.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELTY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. In the cases the gentleman mentions are not those soldiers permitted to enter the soldiers' homes that we maintain?

Mr. WELTY. Yes; and that is all they are permitted to do—to enter soldiers' homes, just as they could enter a county infirmary in my county or your county, and receive nothing more. [Applause.] When you ask them to enter a soldiers' home, you might just as well ask them to enter an infirmary or some other poorhouse.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman does not mean to cast any reflection on the soldiers' homes that we maintain at public expense, does he?

Mr. WELTY. The only difference between a soldiers' home and an infirmary is that the soldiers' home is largely conducted under the Federal Government for the poor and disabled soldiers—a class by themselves—while the infirmaries are conducted in the sovereign States. That is the only difference. We have infirmaries that are just as creditable to this country as are the soldiers' homes; but to ask a soldier suffering from disease and disability to go and spend his time at a soldiers' home without any other compensation, without anything else coming to him, is placing him upon a par with those whom we send to our infirmaries. I think the boys who are suffering and disabled should receive some compensation from the Government. [Applause.]

I think the boy who volunteered when his country needed him is entitled to more than the comforts of a public institution. These boys should receive enough so that they need not be sent to a charitable institution. They have earned the comforts and pleasure of a home and all that it means when surrounded daily by loved ones. God bless our soldier. I shall always support him to his dying day, for it was he who made our country possible, it was he who preserved it when it was endangered, it was he who drove the last vestige of autocracy from the Western Hemisphere, and, thank God, it is to him we can turn when hate and red anarchy attempt to destroy it.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it seems that the Spanish-American War soldier never received any recognition. During the war he was kept in fever-stricken camps, had to sleep on the ground without any straw, was fed on pork that the dogs or the razorback hogs of the South would not eat. His camp was so foul that the ground in spots was gray with maggots. While at Chickamauga Park he had to haul the drinking water for 3 or 4 miles, when Crawfish springs, next to his camp, would have furnished ample pure and cool water. He did not have any recreation camps; was fed on foul, putrid, and embalmed beef, in order that the meat packers might make millions. This is the camp in which he was required to wait for months until he was called to the front for duty. Because of this condition some of the boys became sick, with no hospital facilities and nurses to wait on them. Those who did not die were glad to escape from this camp, and finally, when the day came for their discharge, few refused to sign certificates of good health even though they knew at the time that they were still suffering, because they wanted to get away from these filthy and unhealthy conditions. Most of them were homesick and believed and hoped that they would fully recover after a season under the parental roof.

Oh, Mr. Speaker, I can still see these rosy-cheeked boys leaving their homes mid the cheers and waving of flags, and with the blessings of thousands. In six months they returned pale, haggard, and with loss of health and weight. But as I say, these boys wanted to return to their homes, and would do anything to escape the conditions that the Government permitted the camps to assume; and you can not blame them for signing a certificate showing that they had not incurred any disability during their service. Not one of these brave lads volunteered with any thought of ever receiving a pension, but each was willing to drive autocracy from the Western Hemisphere, and when their work was finished they were equally anxious to return to their homes, with little thought of self. All signed the certificate, but what happened? These certificates of good health now are evidence against them, and are precluding everyone from procuring a pension. Well, you say that he should not have signed this certificate showing good health when he did not possess it. Fine advice to give to a lad who is homesick and honestly believes that is all that ails him. Fine advice to give a boy who wants freedom from military autocracy.

I will gladly vote for this bill in order to remove this evidence against most of these boys who have been suffering under a disability ever since they left the service. I do believe their comrades and the charitable institutions should not longer be required to support them, and I do hope that the bill will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. CARSS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, let us see what this bill does. It makes eligible to pensions those who served in the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, or the Chinese relief expedition, when they can show mental or physical disability, regardless of whether or not that disability was incurred in the line of duty. Under the present law soldiers who served in the Spanish-American War and the Philippine War can secure pensions if they can show that they incurred their disability in the line of duty. A great many of them are now drawing pensions, because they have met the measure of the law. But let us consider whether or not at this time we want to open up the door of the pension roll to soldiers in these wars which are mentioned in the bill, who can not connect their disability with any injury received or disease contracted in line of duty. If we are going to do this, then why not amend article 3 of the war-risk insurance bill at once, strike out that provision of it which requires that the soldier shall, in order to get the compensation benefit, show that he incurred his disability in line of duty. Here is the situation: More than 4,000,000 men served in the World War, and under the ordinary rules of health a certain number of these men will become disabled from accident and disease each and every year. A certain number of them have become disabled and are now disabled since their discharge from the service, but can not connect up their disability with service in the line of duty.

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. No; I can not. I have only five minutes. What reason is there in morals or equity for pensioning the men who served in the Spanish-American War or the Philippine insurrection for disabilities from disease arising or accidents suffered since they left the service and not in any way connected in the line of duty, and refusing the same pension to men who served in the recent World War and who have become disabled in the same way? I can not see one particle of difference.

For instance, in my own district when the first anniversary of the armistice came around the boys had a celebration, and one of the boys who went to France was engaged in the celebration. They had 11 sticks of dynamite to celebrate with. One stick did not explode and this young man went down to inspect it, and about the time he got there it exploded, cut off one of his arms and put out both of his eyes, and he is totally blind to-day. He had allowed his war-risk insurance policy which he had been paying on to lapse and therefore he could not collect for a total disability, and can not collect under article 3 of the war-risk insurance act because the disability was not incurred in the line of duty, and yet he is as totally disabled as any man that can come under the provisions of this bill that we are about to pass. Why not pension that boy, because he was a gallant young fellow, if you are going to admit to the pension roll men who served in the Spanish-American War and Philippine insurrection and who did not suffer their disability in line of duty?

I warn you that unless you are willing to amend section 3 and strike out that provision which requires the boys who served in the World War to show that their disability was incurred in the line of duty that you ought not to pass this bill, because you can not defend it and refuse them the same relief.

I am willing to be liberal and generous with the soldier who was injured in line of duty during the war or contracted a disease as the result of his service, but I am not prepared to go so far as to give this compensation to the one whose injury or disease has no connection with his services in the Army.

Unless we are willing to pass a general disability pension law applying to every soldier who ever served in the Army, regardless of how he incurred his disability, we should not pass this bill.

I am not willing to go that far and therefore will vote against it. [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has overlooked one of the reasons why this country has always pensioned the disabled veterans of its wars, whether they incurred the disability in line of duty or not. The reason is because the country never called for men to fight its battles and failed to get them. The Spanish War veterans responded to their country's call knowing that Congress on June 27, 1890, had voted for pensions for every man who was suffering any sort of disability who served in the war of the sixties. At the proper time the same thing was done for the Mexican War veterans, the same thing was done for the veterans of the War of 1812, the same thing was done for the soldiers of the War of the Revolution, and the same thing will be done for the veterans of the World War 20 years from now.

Mr. BLACK. Why not do it now; why not amend section 3?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The soldier that the gentleman described a moment ago should be pensioned, and if the gentleman will introduce a special bill I have no doubt that it will pass the House unanimously. [Applause.] I will vote for it, and every other Member of the House will vote for it. We have passed special pension bills for such cases for veterans of the Spanish-American War. During the first term I was in Congress we passed special bills for cases similar to that. The time is ripe now for a general law and we should pass this bill to enable the Spanish-American veterans to come under its provisions. [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OGDEN].

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate this Congress for discharging the long-delayed duty which has rested on the Federal Government to the veterans of the War of 1898 these many years.

The bill under consideration, in addition to providing many thousands of the soldiers of the Spanish American War with needed assistance, furnishes further evidence of the fact that this country has not forgotten those who served her so valiantly in that war.

No higher or more important service can be rendered than that of the soldier in time of national emergency. The destiny of the country is committed to his care. Although his undertaking is fraught with danger, he enters upon its performance just when life is replete with hope and all its tides are at their highest, grandest flow—just when the early sunbeams are falling on the steeps of fame; he thinks not at all of the risk or the sacrifice, but only of his burning, eager desire to measure up to his full duty as a true soldier to his flag.

The short duration of the War with Spain dims, perhaps, the full significance of the things accomplished therein and may supply the reason for the delay in enacting necessary legislation for the care and support of the veterans of that war who have become disabled for earning their own support. I would remind my colleagues that the young men who answered the call for volunteers on April 23, 1898—two days after the declaration of war—possessed the same spirit that has characterized the American soldier since the War of Independence. They were eager that the power of a great free people should go out like the benediction of heaven to bring liberty and justice and hope to the oppressed and tyranny-ridden inhabitants of the islands of the sea. But in the short space of a few months our gallant and indomitable Army accomplished more than the conquering of a mighty foe.

The campaign served to reunite our country and bring North and South together as they had not been brought since those early days when the Puritan and the Cavalier shed their blood on the field of Yorktown. The sons of those who fought as foes a little more than 30 years before were comrades under the same command, fighting for the same cause and for one and the same flag. But, more than this, we stepped out upon the broad stage of world action and became one of the great powers; we advanced from the continental domain to world-wide influence. We took a new position in the great family of nations and emerged from a restricted sphere into the arena of the world's activities.

We must not, we can not, forget the services of the veterans of that war. And until we have passed a law that will shield those who have become dependent from the necessity of applying to others for assistance we have not shown a consideration for their interest commensurate with what they accomplished.

The first legislation enacted by Congress for the relief of Civil War soldiers suffering from disabilities not contracted in the military service was in 1890, and this bill very largely follows that act. The principal difference is that the bill under consideration fixes a minimum of $12 and a maximum of $30 per month. The amount of the pension granted will be controlled by the degree of inability to earn a support. The bill very wisely provides that, in determining such inability, each and every infirmity shall be duly considered and the aggregate of the disabilities shown be rated. The length of service required to give a soldier a pensionable status is 90 days, and he must have been honorably discharged from the service. This bill, Mr. Speaker, will give relief to a great many of our soldiers who served during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition. I am personally acquainted with a number of veterans who, under existing law, have had their claims for pensions denied, by reason of their inability to prove by competent evidence that their disability was received in line of duty. The requirements under the general laws are so exacting that only a very limited number of the Spanish-American War veterans have been able to obtain pensions, although thousands of them are totally incapacitated for earning their own living. This bill will come as a blessing to them, as, under its provisions, they will not be required to trace their disability to causes sustained in the service. If misfortune has overtaken them while pursuing the pathway of civil life, from any cause whatsoever, their Government will extend its benevolence in the form of a helping hand.

I would prefer a larger maximum than is provided in this bill for my comrades, but the Committee on Pensions, after thorough investigation and mature thought, and out of a consideration of the opposition that might develop either in this body or in the Senate and thereby endanger the passage of the bill, has fixed the maximum at $30.

It is no doubt true that we will not give complete relief to the totally disabled and dependent soldiers, but by the bill we will improve their present condition under the law as it now exists. In this day of the high cost of every item that enters into the problem of living, $30 per month is, indeed, a pittance to one without home and ability to compete with his fellow man in the great struggle for individual advancement.

I believe that it is not possible for a great country like ours to commit extravagance in legislating in behalf of its soldiers. The achievements of our Army constitute dominant factors in the wonderful progress that we have made as a Nation. Six times the American people have waged war—never for conquest, never for dominion, never for martial glory, never for unworthy or ignoble purpose. The sword in the hand of the American soldier has ever been the emblem of human rights and true civilization.

The good cheer and the Godspeed which the soldier receives when he answers the call of his country in the presence of a momentous undertaking should not lose its quality or become forgotten after his return with duty well and fully performed. And yet sometimes I am inclined to believe that his heroism and valor displayed on the field of action are soon relegated to the forgotten past when the emergency subsides and peace prevails.

One of the proudest periods in my life is that devoted to the service of my country as a soldier during the Spanish-American War, and I shall ever retain fresh in my memory the experiences of that service.

I have been glad to support every measure that has come before this Congress calculated to benefit the soldiers of our country. It gave me pleasure to support the Fuller bill, making increases in the pensions to the old soldiers of the Civil War, whose number is being fast diminished by the ravages of time. I realize the sacrifices in a material way that the veterans of the World War made when they entered the service. They were gathered from every avenue of life and many of them abandoned and gave up opportunities which promised lucrative returns. But they did not hesitate, as they preferred to serve their country at any sacrifice. In every department of the service they reflected credit upon their country, and a grateful people will never cease to applaud their achievements. The world will ever look upon their display of skill and genius as the wonder of the age.

I am heartily in favor of the pending legislation to provide a substantial bonus for them, not as a gratuity or charity, but in further payment of the compensation to which they are rightfully and equitably entitled for the services they have rendered. The economy which they were compelled to practice during their service in order to exist upon the pay received, if applied even in a limited degree to the administration of the affairs of the Government during the next fiscal year, would provide the Treasury with ample means with which to meet the bonus carried in the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that this has been a very busy Congress and that the many important bills essential to the stabilizing of affairs and returning the country to normal conditions have engrossed the time of the membership. But I regard the bonus legislation as one of the most important pending matters and one which well justifies the present consideration of the great Ways and Means Committee. I hope that we shall have the opportunity and pleasure of voting for this bill and enacting it into law without any further delay.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am glad I have an opportunity at last to vote for a measure that will do some justice to the veterans of the Spanish-American War. These men composed an army that never lost a flag, never gave up a foot of ground, never surrendered a gun, and this measure will take care of some of those disabled veterans. Forty thousand of these men volunteered in the last war—volunteered for the second time, although by reason of their age each and every one of them was exempted from the draft.

The total number of men in the service from April 21, 1898, to July 4, 1902, was 434,000. The total number of deaths from all causes among these volunteers was 12,000. Fifty-two thousand Spanish War veterans then either made the great sacrifice or offered to make it during the late war, and any man could be proud to belong to an army with such a record. They participated in 826 battles and engagements and skirmishes of record in which 515 men were killed or wounded. Purely as a pension measure I should oppose this legislation, but knowing as I do that the records kept during the Spanish-American War are in such condition that it is practically impossible for an ex-soldier of that war to prove that disability arose from service, I feel that we must go to the other extreme and take care of the sick and disabled regardless of what the records show.

These men have received less consideration than the veterans of any other war in which the United States was involved, fought in the most unhealthy climate in which American soldiers ever served, and we can not do less than remember that service.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am glad, indeed, to give my support to this bill. Those of us who have served in Congress for a number of years have had opportunities to know of the many cases of distress among veterans of the Spanish-American War, meritorious cases to which relief could not be given for want of just such a law as is proposed in this bill. I am glad it is possible to take up the bill to-day under suspension of the rules. It is to be hoped that the Senators will stop talking about the treaty long enough to pass this measure carrying relief for those worthy and highly patriotic men who responded to the call to arms of President McKinley.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to give my hearty support to this bill. There were a great many men, both single and married, who left my own city of Fall River, Mass., to serve in both the Army and the Navy during the Spanish War. They rendered valuable service there, and there has been a great deal of trouble in securing pensions for them and for the widows and families of the married heroes and the dependent fathers and mothers of the single young men. The calls were made for volunteers, and the young men of that day entered the ranks for the purpose of freeing the island of Cuba from the domination of the Spanish Government and the barbarities and injustice from which the residents of that beautiful island had long suffered. Our country had no ambition to acquire additional territory. We only sought to redeem that land of promise and opportunity from the degradation and disgrace which were visited upon that unfortunate island by its oppressors. All volunteers demonstrated their prowess on land and on sea in a manner that typified the valor and public spirit of the heroes of our Revolutionary forefathers who from 1776 to 1783 fought and suffered to establish the independence of the United States from the thraldom and domination of our oppressors who sought to destroy the hopes and aspirations of the embattled farmers of the earlier days who fought these invaders of our shores who sought to tax them and deny them representation.

I have heard the Spanish War denominated not a war but merely a skirmish with no definite result. I do not so regard it. It cemented together the sections of our country that had been divided in the terrible struggles of the Civil War. The lines of division between the Blue and the Gray were largely shattered by the ties of love and affection that sprang from unity of heart and mind, on sea and on land, as their sons vied with each other in the defense of the flag of the United States during the struggles on the Atlantic and in the Far East on the Pacific.

Our Navy, with but little home training in preparing for battle, shot to disable the ships of our opponents, rather than to kill the men who manned them. They made a record that should arouse the true American spirit of patriotism and should awaken the pride and glory of every citizen of the United States, and awaken to a sense of gratitude in the heart of every Member of the Sixty-sixth Congress who has the responsibility of insuring that the legislation embodied in this bill shall be enacted into law without unnecessary delay. I well remember when these men left their homes, full of vigor and life, and I have seen many of them of later years who bear the effects of their service in all the struggles named in this meritorious bill. What did we do for Cuba? She was afflicted with yellow fever which affected our own dear land and our homes and firesides.

We established a system of sewerage and enforced cleanliness such as the island of Cuba had never known under its filth and degradation, that almost entirely engulfed it.

I can not enumerate all the heroic deeds of the soldiers and sailors of that war, but I will refer to the heroic work of one citizen of the city of Fall River, Mass., where I reside, who, when volunteers were called upon to cut the cable at Guantanamo Bay to destroy the power of the Spanish Navy to communicate with Havana, sprang to the side of the steamer and sped to the point of contact and severed the cable and destroyed the connection; but he forfeited his life for the heroic act. His name was John J. Doran, a humble mechanic in said Fall River, Mass., and a hero whose memory is loved and respected there and the camp of Spanish War Veterans in that city is honored in bearing the name of "The John J. Doran Camp of United Spanish War Veterans of Fall River, Mass."

My time is too limited to recall all the heroes of that valiant struggle. Can anyone forget or belittle the memory of the lamented Admiral George Dewey, the hero of Manila Bay?

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am glad we have reached the consideration of the Sells bill to pension the Spanish-American War veterans. This day calls to our mind the great debt of gratitude to those who in that intense struggle brought victory to American arms. The act is sufficiently comprehensive to include within its terms those who fought during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition.

There were approximately 312,000 men engaged in this struggle, and the cost will not be so great as to put an undue burden on the taxpayers. The cost during the first year is estimated to be a little over $2,000,000, the second year twelve million, and by the third year about fifteen million. Thus during the three years the cost will only be about $29,000,000, which is about what we were spending each half day as our part of the World War.

These men went forth to serve their country in Cuba, in Porto Rico, and the Philippines. They contracted malaria, fevers, and other diseases prevalent in the torrid climates of these countries. Heretofore they have been pensioned only where their disability was traceable to the service, but 20 years have elapsed, and we find that they are entitled to more liberal recognition by the country they so valiantly served.

Mr. Speaker, a feeling of sorrow comes to those of us who were close in our friendship to the late Hon. Carl C. Van Dyke. We should all bow to the will of our Maker, but we can not help but feel how proud he would be if he were here to-day to see his comrades obtain the recognition that will be given to them when this bill has passed. Congressman Van Dyke was the commander in chief of the United Spanish War Veterans. When he was carried back to his native State of Minnesota by his comrades in the Spanish-American War and his colleagues in Congress a more impressive tribute to his memory could not have been given.

As he lay in state in the beautiful capitol at St. Paul, guarded by his Spanish-American war comrades, thousands upon thousands of his friends came to pay their silent tribute of love and respect. Some of those same comrades are here to-day. He was ever alert in their interest, and while the whole Nation suffered a loss in his death the United Spanish War Veterans suffered a peculiar loss. He was their chief, their counselor, and their friend.

I felt highly honored when the Worth Bagley Camp, to which he belonged, conferred honorary membership in the Spanish War Veterans upon those of his colleagues, including myself, who accompanied him when he was laid to rest.

This great organization of these tried and true veterans will serve their country in peace with the same spirit of patriotism and heroism as in the days of war. They will be a bulwark of defense against any attempt to overthrow the institutions of the Government for which they offered their lives and strike mighty blows in the great fight for steady progress toward the high goal of achievement within our reach. [Applause.]

On September 22, 1902, in Detroit, Mich., at a meeting of the Spanish War Veterans, there were two notable speeches made, one by Capt. Richmond P. Hobson and the other by the then President, Theodore Roosevelt. Capt. Hobson said on that occasion:

> I would rather be born an American than be the crown prince of any kingdom on earth. And for the South may I say to you, veterans of the Civil War, that the South is happy and grateful to you to-day that she was not allowed to secede. I bring witness, if any is necessary—and you will pardon the indulgence I take in referring to the fact—that of the four medals of honor voted by Congress for the late war four went to sons of the South.
> The Navy in America is a word to conjure by. In the Spanish War the Navy really made a record that will stand unchallenged until the last day in human history. It will stand as the maximum of efficiency, for never before in history did one fleet completely destroy another, never did one fleet gain a victory, without having a serious injury inflicted. This record was broken twice by the victories of Manila Bay and Santiago. This extraordinary characteristic has followed our Navy from the start, when Paul Jones set the pace.

Col. Roosevelt, in a stirring speech to his comrades, said:

> The war itself was an easy one. The tasks left behind us, though glorious, have been hard. Yes; the men of the Spanish War, you and your comrades in arms who fought in Cuba and Porto Rico and in the Philippines, won renown for the country, added to its moral grandeur and to its material prosperity, but you also have left duties to be done by those who came after you.
> I speak in the presence not only of the men who fought in the Spanish War and in the Philippine war, which was its aftermath, but in the presence of the veterans who fought in the great war, and, more than that, I speak here in a typical city of the old Northwest, of what is now the Middle West, in a typical State of our Union. You men of Michigan have been mighty in war and mighty in peace. You belong to a country mighty in war and mighty in peace, a country of a great past, whose great present is but an earnest of an even greater future.

> This country has never yet been called upon to meet a crisis in war or a crisis in peace to which it did not eventually prove equal, and decade by decade its power rose greater and the likelihood of its meeting successfully any crisis becomes even more assured.
> We are optimists. We spurn the teachings of despair and distrust. We have an abiding faith in the growing strength, the growing future, of the mighty young Nation still in the flush of its youth and yet already with the might of a giant which stands on a continent and grasps an ocean with either hand. Succeed? Of course we shall succeed! How can success fail to come to a race of masterful energy and resolute character, which has a continent for the base of its domain and which feels with its veins the thrill that comes to generous souls when their strength stirs in them and they know that the future is theirs? No great destiny ever yet came to a nation whose people were laggards or faint-hearted. No great destiny ever yet came to a people walking with their eyes on the ground and their faces shrouded in gloom. No great destiny ever yet came to a people who feared the future, who feared failure more than they hoped for success. With such as these we have no part.
> We know there are dangers ahead, as we know there are evils to fight and overcome, but we feel to the full the pulse of the prosperity which we enjoy. Stout of heart, we see across the dangers the great future that lies beyond, and we rejoice as a giant refreshed, as a strong man girt for the race; and we go down into the arena where the nations strive for mastery, our hearts lifted with the faith that to us and to our children and our children's children it shall be given to make this Republic the greatest of all the peoples of mankind.

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to close without extending my congratulations to the Committee on Pensions reporting out this bill, and particularly to the gentleman from Tennessee, the Hon. SAM R. SELLS, the distinguished chairman of that committee. With tireless energy and persistent industry he has worked in season and out of season that this great act of justice should be done for his comrades, and the work of the House to-day will be the fruition of countless months of labor on his part.

In the passage of this act to-day, Mr. Speaker, the Republic expresses in a concrete way the gratitude that is in the hearts of her people for whom these men fought. [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad of the opportunity to support and vote for this bill. It is a just and too long-delayed recognition of what the country owes to the brave men who so gloriously upheld the honor and dignity of the American name in the freeing of the Republic of Cuba, the pacification of the Philippine Islands, which fell to us by reason of the War with Spain, and in the Boxer uprising in China. I hope it can never be said of any American Congress that the Representatives of the people of this Republic failed to appreciate and recognize in every reasonable way what the country owes to its soldiers, sailors, and marines of every war in which the country has been or may be engaged.

Under existing law no soldier of the War with Spain or of the Philippine insurrection or of the China relief expedition can be pensioned unless he is able to prove to the satisfaction of the pension officials that he is suffering from a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty. Many of them are suffering from disabilities so incurred, but they are unable to positively prove that such disabilities are the result of their Army service, though they undoubtedly are. This bill only provides pensions for those who are now disabled, but relaxes the law to the extent of not requiring that proof be made that their present disabilities were incurred in the service and in the line of duty. The bill is on the same principle as the Civil War act of June 27, 1890, which provided pensions for the soldiers of that war who were disabled to the extent of being unable to earn a living by manual labor.

I look upon the matter of pensions to soldiers and their dependents in a little different light than some others. The sums we pay in pensions are not wasted or thrown away. Every dollar that is thus expended by the Government goes into immediate circulation in the communities all over this land and benefits every community. But more, much more, than this, it is a just recognition by the Government of the obligation it owes to the country's defenders and is an encouragement and assurance of appreciation and support to those who may hereafter be called upon to defend our country, our institutions, and our flag. It promotes patriotism, love of country, devotion to our institutions, and recognition of the obligations of citizenship. In every war we have ever had it has been demonstrated that the men who fought the battles, who braved death for a principle, when the war was over proved themselves to be loyal and patriotic citizens, true Americans, whose lives and example were ever an inspiration to the youth of the land. As the Government recognizes the service of the men of former wars, so may the younger men who were privileged to serve their country in the late World War be assured that their services and sacrifices will not be forgotten nor neglected by a grateful people.

I hope this bill may speedily pass and become a law, and I trust that after it passes this House it may not be allowed to sleep at the other end of the Capitol, as some other pension bills have fared during the present Congress. True, there are weighty questions being considered by both Houses of Congress, requiring much time and the most careful consideration; true also it is that there is the most urgent need for economizing in Government expenditures; but, to my mind, nothing is of greater importance than to fitly and promptly recognize our obligations to the brave men now living of all past wars and to their dependents. The admonition of Abraham Lincoln "to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan," should sink deep in every heart, and what we know we should do, and what we propose to do, let us do it now.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, the Government of the United States of America, I believe, stands ready at all times to render every possible appreciation and assistance to soldiers who have defended its flag. That time, in so far as it relates to soldiers of the Spanish-American War, is now here. I am glad to be informed that in the Pension Committee the entire committee reported in favor of the bill; that there was a unanimous report in favor of this relief for soldiers of the Spanish-American War.

In the last Congress I was interested, as I suspect was everyone else in the House, in a bill for the relief of the widows and children of the Spanish-American War veterans. I want to go on record as saying that I think pension bills which afford relief to widows and dependent children are among the most valuable of all the bills for the relief of our soldiers. The widows and dependent children of Spanish-American War soldiers are entitled to their pensions. I know that we may afford benefit by special enactment, but I am in favor of general recognition, of doing everything proper for the relief of the soldier who has borne American arms in any war, for his widow and his dependent children. [Applause.]

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Pensions, I want to supplement the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] by saying that every Democratic member of the committee, as well as every Republican member of the committee, voted to report out the bill. To-day they are all here to see that the bill receives favorable consideration, and I know that it will.

This particular legislation is for the relief of the men who served in the Philippine insurrection, the China relief expedition, and the War with Spain. It provides that an applicant for a pension must have served over 90 days, and the amount of the pension shall not in this particular bill exceed $30 or be less than $12 per month, according to the conditions and circumstances of the particular case. These men, from every State in the Union, answering the call of President McKinley in 1898, have, after fighting that war and enduring innumerable hardships, supported, for the past 22 years, by their own voluntary subscriptions, their comrades who have since become disabled. For example, last year in New York City alone the Veterans of the Spanish-American War spent over $200,000 out of their own pockets in caring for their disabled comrades, unable to care for themselves by reason of some disability or other.

It seems to me that with the committee unanimous in its favorable report of this bill declaring for disability pensions of $30 as a maximum and $12 per month as a minimum, and with the amendment with respect to age pensions, granting men 62 years of age $12, men of 68 years $18, men of 72 years $24, and men of 75 years of age $30 per month, there should be no opposition from anyone. It is the adopted policy of the Government to pay veterans disability and age pensions, and if we expect men to answer the call to arms in time of war we must adhere to that policy. I hope we will never have another war. However, these men have patiently waited for 22 years before coming to us for relief. They are not asking for anything that they do not richly deserve, and it is our paramount duty to pass this bill here and now.

These men made a great record. They were hurriedly recruited, poorly equipped, fed on hardtack and embalmed beef, fought against acclimated regulars in distant tropical lands, and never lost, by capture, a man, boat, gun, or an inch of ground, and, like the veterans of all our wars, they upheld the glorious traditions of America.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Colorado.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, I am not as much impressed with the arguments of the gentlemen from Texas as I usually am with their arguments. They object to this bill because it does not require that it be shown that the disability of the soldier was incurred in service. There is an important distinction with reference to disabilities under which Spanish War veterans are now suffering, 22 years after the Spanish War took place, and that is that nearly every man in that service, who saw foreign service, had his health permanently impaired, and, as has been pointed out, it is impossible to furnish the proof that the disability under which he is suffering now was incurred in the service. There is a broader view, however, and that is that the country at that time was under a disability, not very serious perhaps, but nevertheless a disability, a trouble involving war, and these men who volunteered for that service did not ask the country—the United States—to prove that its disability was incurred in line of duty. They assumed that it was. They believed that in declaring war their country was acting "in line of duty," and they further believed that its duty was their duty.

And I think it is a sound principle that when a man is willing to place his own life in jeopardy his country should see to it thereafter that that man should not be reduced to destitution, poverty, and starvation, and I for one am by no means frightened by the prospect that we may some day have to take care of sick men who offered their lives for the United States in the World War. Now, Mr. Speaker, our attention to-day is riveted very naturally and properly on soldiers of two other wars. They are the young men who kept America's honor unsullied in the World War, and the old men who in the dark days between 1861 and 1865 preserved this Nation to become the defender of civilization. But I hope that we shall not lose sight of those men of equal patriotism and courage who preserved in our War with Spain the best traditions of '61 and transmitted them with added purity and luster to the boys of 1917.

As we think of wars to-day the War with Spain was not a great war, but it was a most important one. It unified us at home. It took the "bloody shirt" forever out of American politics. It made Dixie popular in the North and Yankee Doodle popular in the South. It established us as a world power—not of aggression but of beneficence, enlightenment, and progress. It constituted a taking upon our shoulders of our share of the white man's burden, and it was the beginning of the demonstration, which has ever since been made by the United States to all the world, that that burden can be carried with justice and generosity.

It was not a great war in the sense of numbers engaged. It was great in its call to humanity. It was great in its results to the United States and to all Christendom. And it was also great in its sufferings and hardships to the men engaged in it. They fought in the fever-ridden swamps of the Tropics. Their casualties, both in battle and by disease, were far greater in proportion to their numbers than in the war now happily ended. They deserve as considerate treatment from their Government as any other class of soldiers.

This bill deals only with the soldiers themselves, and under the rule by which we got it considered to-day it can not be amended in this House by the addition of provisions relating to the widows and children of deceased soldiers of the Spanish War, but I can not let this opportunity pass without calling attention to what I consider a very glaring defect and lack of equity in our present laws relating to pensions of those widows and children. This injustice arises from the construction placed by the Pension Office upon the act approved July 16, 1918, "to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China." (Public No. 199, 65th Cong.). This construction is announced in the case of Anna, widow of Oscar J. R. de Rochemont, case No. 104, decided January 31, 1919. This decision is to the effect that while the dependents of a volunteer officer or enlisted man are pensionable if the soldier served for 90 days or more during the period of the war, independent of the geographical locality of such service, yet the dependents of a soldier (officer or enlisted man) of the Regular Army are not pensionable unless such soldier's service included 90 days at the actual theater of military operations.

While this decision is highly technical, I must concede that it was probably correct under the language of the act of July 16, 1918, especially as Assistant Secretary Hopkins referred to the language of the debates on that act when it was being considered and quoted Mr. Keating, of Colorado, who had the bill in charge, to show the legislative intent, as follows:

> This bill does not provide pension for the widow or minor children of a soldier or sailor of the Regular Establishment unless he actually left the confines of the United States and participated actively in the War with Spain. (CONG. RECORD, July 9, 1918, p. 8920.)

It seems to me, however, that the policy of such a distinction is wrong and that it should be abrogated. In time of peace as well as in time of war we solicit men to undertake military service as a profession, though everybody knows that it is a profession which will endanger a man's life in the event of war. The probabilities, well known to the professional soldier, are that he will be called into action ahead of the volunteer, and this often affords a strong motive for enlistment of venturesome spirits even in time of peace. Military service in time of war is military service wherever it is rendered and is subject to the danger of death by disease as well as death by bullets. I was a soldier in the volunteer service in the War with Spain. I contracted typhoid fever in camp in the United States and lay for several weeks at the point of death. If I had died and had left a widow she would have had a pensionable status under the decision in the De Rochemont case. But some of my friends, civilians, enlisted in the Regulars at the outbreak of that war, deeming it their best chance to get to the front. If one of them had died from fever contracted in camp in the United States his family would not have had a pensionable status. They would have been debarred from it because the husband or father had chosen the service more likely to cause him to die for his country.

Why should there be a distinction anyway between those whose orders were to stay here and those whose orders were to go to Cuba or the Philippines? It will not do to say that the former did not render military service in the war. The fact that they were in the Army was the very reason why it was possible to send men of some other organization to the actual front.

Now, an interesting thing developed in debate here a few days ago. It appeared that under the act of July 16, 1918, the family of a soldier who did "leave the confines of the United States," and who did "participate actively in the War with Spain," was not entitled to pensionable status, although he was wounded in battle and actually died as the result of such wound, the reason being that the wound caused him to be sent to the United States before he had had his 90 days' service at the front and also caused him to be discharged on account of disability, so that he did not die in the service. This is the case cited by Mr. GARD, of Ohio (RECORD, Jan. 21, p. 1847). It is, of course, an extreme case, but it is extreme cases which test a law.

Such a lack of equity is abhorrent to our sense of justice. One of my earliest acts as a Member of the Sixty-sixth Congress was to introduce a bill to put the widows and orphans of the Regular soldiers who served in the War with Spain on the same plane as the dependents of those of us who went in with the Volunteers. It is H. R. 7408, and, speaking as a former soldier outside of the Regular Establishment, speaking from a heart full of the tribute which must be yielded in fairness to the Regular by the National Guardsman and the Volunteer, I earnestly urge upon my colleagues the passage of that bill for the widow and the orphan of the man who rendered as loyal and faithful service as any of us rendered, for the widow and orphan who are as much entitled to the protection of a just Government as my own widow and orphan would be.

Mr. Speaker, the soldiers of the Regular Army rendered a necessary and an exceedingly important service in the War with Spain. Of course, it was no braver or more self-sacrificing service than that which was performed by the Volunteers. Any distinction in degree of patriotism between these two branches of the service would be unfair—as unfair as the distinction in the pension law passed by the last Congress. But the Regulars had a great opportunity for service, and the Regular soldiers of the United States have never neglected such an opportunity. Just as our volunteer armies had the larger share in bringing the islands of the Pacific under the influence of the United States, so our Regular Army did the major part of the work in Cuba. That work was a great factor in the winning of the war. Many military critics say that it was the deciding factor. I do not care to argue the point. It was a great work well done.

The profession of the Regulars, a profession of the highest necessity to the Government and which the Government urges men to undertake, bars them from active participation in politics. They are nobody's constituents. They elect no Representatives to Congress. They can not hold up the fear of punishment to a Congressman who denies them redress. They can offer no reward to the Congressman who hears their plea. Their widows and orphans must rely merely upon our sense of fairness, our desire to do equity. For this reason especially they should have equity. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SELLS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW].

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, my only objection to this bill is the tardiness of its enactment. I count it tremendously unfortunate for anything to be done or left undone that will cause distrust of the Government on the part of the citizens in general; and it borders on tragedy for our Government to pursue a course that seems to show national ingratitude toward the soldiers who offered their lives for the American flag. Too long has this country waited to give substantial legislative recognition of the valor of our Spanish-American War veterans. The sinking of the Maine, the plight of the pleading Cubans—the "Queen of the Antilles" staggering from 400 years of slavery under the black shadow of Morro Castle—these, all these, constituted a clarion call to arms which caused patriotic young Americans, North, South, East, and West, to flock to the colors with a volunteer enthusiasm that was at once a tonic and an inspiration to patriots everywhere. But our Government was not prepared to care for these soldiers as we did for the soldiers of the recent World War. The camps suffered for lack of sanitation and necessary bodily comforts; the toll of death was pathetic, and thousands of those who survived disease and Spanish shot and shell are carrying until this good day many marks of physical depletion as the measure of their exposure and the proof of their devotion.

Let us make haste in this tardy legislation to show our gratitude to these heroic defenders of our flag. If we must think of war at all, we love to think of the Spanish-American War as the first opportunity that came to us after the "uncivil" war between the States for the sons of the Blue and the sons of the Gray to fight side by side for our common flag [applause]; and ever since this first blood-bought fellowship of the once sundered sections—ever since Theodore Roosevelt and "Fighting Joe" Wheeler charged together in glorious loyalty up San Juan Hill—they buried in the trenches around Santiago the bickerings and bitterness of an unhappy past as they had never been buried before. And the sons of "the wind-swept North and the sun-kissed South" who followed their starry standard to victory were the hero evangels of a new world prestige and a new national fellowship, and we honor ourselves as lawmakers to-day when we refuse to longer delay this inadequate expression of love and helpfulness from the heart of a grateful Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KLECZKA].

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Pensions which considered and reported favorably the pending bill, I am firmly impressed with the urgency for this legislation. A casual survey of the individual pension bills considered by our committee and which could not be acted upon favorably because of the lack of legal authority, will convince any unbiased and fair-minded Member of the necessity of this measure.

There is no division of judgment among the members of the committee, who are familiar with these conditions, as to the crying need of this legislation. Hundreds of bills have been introduced praying for relief for Spanish-American War veterans who have become incapacitated for work since they were released from service. The majority of these claims were based upon disability not incurred in war service. Many who claimed that their infirmities originated during the period of actual service were unable to furnish medical proof because of lost or destroyed records and hence no relief could be afforded them.

A large percentage of the soldiers who served in Cuba or in the Philippines contracted a character of disease that did not fully manifest itself until some time after the termination of their service. Under the rules of the Pension Department all of these men were and will be denied pensions except by special acts of Congress or unless this measure is passed. This bill removes and overcomes all these obstacles and will give aid and relief to those who are most deserving of a grateful people's consideration. It will, but in a limited measure, enable the Nation to discharge its obligations to its valiant defenders.

I know from personal observation of the distressful condition of many of these veterans. The Northwestern Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is located in my district. These veterans have passed the meridian of life, and with health impaired, and in many cases with physical injuries sustained to an extent that wholly incapacitates them for any work, they could not be cared or provided for by their families or relatives and were compelled to seek shelter in these institutions.

The testimony before the committee discloses the fact that the Spanish-American War veterans and other associations are required to contribute annually hundreds of thousands of dollars to take care of these incapacitated soldiers and sailors. Surely the people of this country do not desire these unfortunate and disabled soldiers and sailors to become objects of charity. To alleviate their wants and soothe their sufferings is therefore but a feeble expression of the Nation's gratitude. Of course, their sacrifices can never be adequately compensated. Their services can not be measured by any monetary standards. They heroically rendered their part, they were ready to give their all; now is the Nation's opportunity to perform its duty and partly, at least, discharge its obligation.

Twenty-two years have elapsed since that memorable conflict, but the lapse of time has not erased from our memory the results of their valiant efforts nor diminished the glory of their heroic achievements. The passage of this bill will bear splendid testimony that those who respond to the country's call will never be forgotten in their hour of need and distress and that passing years but increase our solicitude for their comfort and well-being. [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS].

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad for the opportunity of speaking in favor of this bill granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors who participated in the Spanish-American War. During my service of seven years in Congress I have been a member of the Committee on Pensions, and my length of service on this committee is exceeded only by the distinguished chairman, Mr. SELLS, of Tennessee. I have always favored granting liberal pensions to the soldiers and sailors of all our wars, and when elected to the Sixty-third Congress I requested that I be assigned to the Committee on Pensions. This has given me an opportunity to assist in the passing of many meritorious special or private pension bills, and also to assist in the framing and passage of general pension legislation favorable to our soldiers and sailors. I firmly believe that no money that the Government appropriates is better or more wisely expended than the money that is paid to disabled veterans who through service in defense of our country incurred disabilities that render them unable to earn a livelihood. The bill now before the House was carefully considered by our committee, and was favorably reported by the unanimous vote of the committee. It is unnecessary for me to take up the time of the House in explaining the merits of this bill for I am fully convinced that the bill as reported will pass the House by an almost unanimous vote. I hope that the Senate will give this measure prompt and favorable consideration and that it will become a law without unnecessary delay. [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to be able to vote for this bill. As one who had a very modest part in the Civil War, I feel a great interest in this bill. Every Congressman here knows that to establish the fact whether a disability was incurred in service or not is one of the most difficult things that come before us.

Many a Civil War veteran has been refused a pension because he has been unable to trace his disability with certainty to his service or in the line of duty. Rheumatism and many other diseases doubtless had their origin in military service in many cases, but there is no way to legally prove the fact. I believe that every Civil War veteran will be pleased that their comrades of the Spanish War have at last received fair consideration.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes, and the gentleman from Minnesota 5 minutes.

Mr. SELLS. I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to take up much time, and I would like to have the privilege of extending my remarks on this bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right already.

Mr. SELLS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, of course I am in favor of the passage of this bill. I am not in harmony with the views expressed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. The gentleman states that he saw service in the Spanish-American War and thinks that he voices the sentiment of many veterans of that war in opposing this legislation. He says there are many of those who saw service who are not asking for and who would oppose this legislation. I, too, like my former comrade from Texas, served as a volunteer throughout that war. I suffered no physical disability by reason of that service, and do not believe that the gentleman from Texas suffered any permanent physical disability. There are thousands of these veterans who are suffering disability by reason of that service. I know many men who went through that struggle, and a struggle it was for them; not a battle of bullets but a battle with disease. They left the service broken in spirit and in health. When they returned to civil life they were not the same ruddy-cheeked boys who but a few months before had voluntarily answered their country's call and placed their lives upon the Nation's altar. It would not be becoming for me to dwell upon the hardships endured. The facts and the conditions as they were at that time are well known to every Member of this House, and in the face of these facts it seems to me that this Congress would be falling far short of its duty if this legislation was delayed another day.

This is the first specific legislation providing pensions for this particular class of men. Under existing law they are compelled to apply under the general pension laws, and in order to qualify under existing law they must establish to the satisfaction of the authorities, and, in short, must furnish positive proof, that the disability complained of is of service origin and contracted in the line of duty. I have personal knowledge of many cases where the disability is unquestioned but where it is impossible to show by competent proof that the disability originated while in the service. These suffering and deserving men are denied relief under present law even though there is a moral certainty as to the origin of their troubles.

In the Spanish-American War the deaths caused in actual battle were few compared with the net deaths. Insanitary surroundings, unwholesome food, and tropical climatic conditions ruined the health of many a lad. From that day to this he has never been the same man. The decline has been gradual, but none the less sure, so that by reason of the very nature of the ailment proof of its inception is the more difficult. The number of men who receive pensions for wounds under the general law to-day is small, indeed, compared with the number of those who are receiving pensions because of shattered health—where these men were able to furnish hospital records and the testimony of witnesses familiar with all the facts. It is interesting to note that in the great World War, in the first 12 months, about 800,000 American soldiers, sailors, and marines were engaged, mostly upon the western front in France. I am informed that the number of deaths from wounds and disease was 8,634. In the Spanish War, for a similar period, the deaths from wounds and disease were 12,000. In the War with Spain there were 335,000 Volunteers and 100,000 Regulars—435,000 in all. It will be observed that with about double the number of men in the World War, for the first year there was almost one-third less deaths than in the first 12 months during the War with Spain.

It is an easy matter to show origin of injury when the injury was caused in action, but the matter is entirely different where circumstances are as they were in Cuba and in the Philippines. During the Spanish-American War our Army learned much about sanitation and keeping sick records. The men of the recent war will not be so handicapped in making proof.

It has been suggested in this debate that the men who volunteered in this war did so with full knowledge of the act of June 27, 1890, passed for the benefit of the soldiers in the Civil War, and that these soldiers had a right to believe, and did believe, that they would be treated in a like manner; and that for this reason, if for no other, we should pass this law.

I do not think for one minute that the men who answered President McKinley's call in 1898 gave the matter of compensation or pension a single thought. Well do I remember when the newspapers throughout the country announced the sinking of the Maine and a little later the declaration of war. Volunteers were asked for. The call was answered by hundreds of thousands of patriotic boys and men. In popular language the issue was oversubscribed. The pay which the private soldier received was $15.60 a month, and there was no bonus. It was patriotism and duty, not the thought of pay or future pension, that prompted those boys. Medicine was scarce and medical attendance was less available. In the company in which I served the citizens from my home town provided medicines, and these medicines were administered to the boys and treatment given to them by a physician and surgeon who happened to be a line officer in the regiment. This doctor knew these boys, and was better able to care for their wants than was the authorized Army surgeon; however, at this time this very fact militates against the soldier when pension is concerned. The boys treated in this way do not have an army sick record. In the southern camps practically every northern man in the service suffered from dysentery, malaria, and many from rheumatism. They have never recovered. As age advances their sufferings and disabilities increase, and as a consequence their earning capacity decreases.

I have recently had several pension cases where the record shows that the boy at the time of his discharge signed the statement that he had received no injury during his military service, and an effort is made to thereby estop him from now receiving a pension. When the boy signed that statement he was not thinking of pension. His task had been completed; he was anxious to return home; it is not his spirit to claim that to which he is not entitled. The present bill will remedy just such cases.

If a man is entitled to any consideration at all, he should receive at least $12 a month, the minimum provided, and the maximum, or $30 a month, provided for in this bill is not excessive. Indeed, it is inadequate, and I would strenuously oppose this small maximum were it not for the fact that the soldier still has recourse to existing law and can receive as much as $72 a month, provided he complies with the conditions imposed under that law.

It can not be said that this action is premature. More than 20 years have passed since that war, and pursuing the policy heretofore adopted by this Congress it seems wise to say that all these men who were honorably discharged should upon arriving at the age of 62 years receive a $12 a month pension, and arriving at the age of 68 years should receive $18 a month, at the age of 72 years $24 a month, and at the age of 75 years $30 a month.

The few gentlemen who have opposed this legislation on the floor of this House insist that they are not discriminating against the Spanish-American War soldier, but are opposed to the general policy of pensions as heretofore annunciated.

Fortunate, indeed, it is for the American people that men with such views are in the minority. It surely can not be said that sectionalism enters into this matter. I noticed when the Fuller pension bill passed the House a large majority of those voting against the bill came from a section of the country where Union soldiers of the Civil War are scarce. The Spanish-American War was not a sectional war.

The Thirty-first Michigan Volunteer Infantry, of which I was a member, was brigaded with the First Georgia Volunteer Infantry. Our colonel was the son of a northern soldier and the colonel of the First Georgia was the son of a southern soldier. We camped in Chickamauga Park on the ground where our fathers had fought—that made no difference. Together we celebrated Robert E. Lee day in Savannah, Ga. Shoulder to shoulder we marched. Heart to heart we stood. There was no North; there was no South; there was no East; there was no West. It was the Nation's call that was answered. It is the Nation's soldiers who are to be benefited by this law.

This legislation does not contemplate a gratuity or charity. I feel that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is out of touch with the feeling in the country when he suggests that this legislation should not be enacted because national soldiers' homes are provided. America will never see the day when her citizens, members of her patriotic armies, are compelled to give up home ties and home surroundings, and unwillingly seek refuge in public institutions. The soldiers' homes are splendid institutions and should be maintained, but their maintenance should have no effect on pension legislation.

I yield to no Member in this House in my opposition to extravagant and unnecessary appropriations at this particular time. We should not saddle upon the taxpayers of this country unmerited and unwise pensions. It has been estimated that approximately 10,000 soldiers will be subject to immediate relief if this act becomes a law. This amount will not be burdensome.

During my short term in Congress I have supported every measure providing for the relief of our soldiery, and I sincerely hope that the time is not far distant when this body will take affirmative and decisive action in behalf of the ex-service men of the recent Great War. I appreciate that this will cost money, but do not believe that the American people are penurious in this matter, and am satisfied that our constituency demands prompt action.

Mr. Speaker, there is no question but what this bill will pass the House, and it is my hope that the same may become a law.

Mr. SELLS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, no nation ever waged a more unselfish war than our country did against Spain in 1898. The spirit of the Nation which forced a declaration of war was the spirit of justice crying out against injustice and wrongdoing. It was the spirit of service in the cause of another rather than in the mere protection of one's self.

This was the spirit of the Nation and this was the spirit of the 300,000 young men who heard the call of duty.

The war was a short one, but the service, whether in southern camp or tropical swamp or jungle, disabled and incapacitated many of its participants. Those who were discharged for disability have already been provided for with pensions under existing laws. However, the health of many a man was permanently affected and impaired by this service, but which impairment did not warrant his discharge and was not in evidence upon his discharge.

This was 20 years ago. The effects of this service upon some of the men are now becoming apparent, but under existing law the men disabled are not entitled to a Federal pension.

The measure before us is designed to take care of just such cases. By an act of Congress in 1890 this country provided for the relief of veterans of the Civil War suffering from disabilities not contracted in the service. This bill applies to Spanish-American War veterans the policy then started.

Following out the injunction of the immortal Lincoln in his second inaugural address, "Let us care for him who has borne the battle." [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR.]

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, the need for this legislation is so urgent, the demands are so great on the part of those who are absolutely in need, that I am glad to give it my hearty support. The bill now under consideration in the House is one that should have been passed years ago and is in line with the policy of the Government since its very beginning. It has always been the aim of the United States to provide for those who fought for their country and to make their after lives free from the haunting fear of poverty and the pinching curse of want.

The old adage that "Republics are ungrateful" is one that patriotic Americans resent, and by our action to-day we not only gladden the hearts of thousands of sick and destitute veterans of 1898, but we prove to the world at large that whatever might have been true of the Republics of old, Columbia, at least, is ever ready to acknowledge and repay the debt she owes the boys who respond to the trumpet call of duty and "rally round the flag" whenever the country needs them.

In its effect on the country at large, the War with Spain was more than memorable. The moment war was declared and President McKinley called for volunteers a ready and immediate response reechoed throughout the country. Overnight all sectionalism vanished from the land, all racial feelings were obliterated, and with one pulsating thought East and West, North and South, sent forth their quotas of men, ready and willing to meet life or death, to endure the close grip of battle or the deadly pestilence of the Tropics with equal composure.

The war did not last long and the losses in battle were not heavy, but exposure to the burning heat of the Tropics, the poisonous miasmas of the jungle and swamp, the deadly fevers and malignant diseases of an unaccustomed climate took heavy toll of our Army and to-day in the graveyards of every city, town, and village of the country thousands of the boys of '98 are sleeping their last sleep, while thousands of others are wrecks of the men who went away full of the health and vigor of young manhood.

It is, moreover, specially to be considered in the case of the veterans of the War with Spain that the diseases they contracted, and in many cases will never be permanently cured of, are mostly of the subtle kind that may stay dormant for years and then appear and cause untold pain and suffering.

Every Member of Congress has case after case of malarial poisoning that could not come from any other cause and yet can not be traced to Army origin, and no matter how worthy the claimant may be, no matter how dire his need, there is no provision under the law by which his sufferings can be mitigated or his urgent wants relieved.

These men have waited long and patiently for this recognition. Twenty years have passed since they followed the colors. The young men of '98 are middle-aged now and many of them broken down, needy, and helpless, and it is not any too early for the country to assume its sacred obligation to them and grant them a right to a place on the pension roll with the boys of '61.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, heretofore it was necessary for a soldier of the Spanish War in order to get a pension to prove disability contracted in the service. But in the 22 years which have elapsed since the Spanish War there are hundreds of men who have become blind, who have become paralyzed, who have lost limbs, who are totally disabled, and who deserve to have the benefits of this bill and I hope it will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. I have only one more speech on this side, and I would ask the gentleman to use his remaining time.

Mr. CARSS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think, since my action in reference to the war-risk insurance act, that anybody in this House can say I am not willing to do what I think and what the country thinks is justice to the soldier who becomes disabled in the service; but I can not look upon this bill at the present time as anything but a colossal piece of hypocrisy. If you want to pass a law along this line it would be all right, and it would be consistent to come in here with a service pension for all men who served in the Spanish-American War. Or if you wanted to pass a general old-age pension act, you would be consistent to come in here at this time. Or if you wanted to pass a bill granting disability pensions to all the people in the United States that were injured in industry or in any of the pursuits or occupations, it would be consistent. But to come in here 20 years after the war is over and pick out a special class and say that, because a man's team has run away with him and has broken his legs, the Government of the United States ought to pension him and not pension any other citizen of the United States for the same and a similar accident seems to me is the most colossal piece of inconsistency I have ever known.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, the Spanish-American War veterans have asked very little in the past, and they have received very little. They got very little in the war itself but harsh treatment. No body of men that ever volunteered to serve under our flag have received so little consideration at the hands of their Government. They had no recreation centers; they had no nurses to soothe them; they had no cheer leaders; they had no dormitories. Many of them slept on the bare ground in southern swamps all through the war. What with embalmed beef and improper military sanitation, their experience was no holiday. In the brief Spanish-American War 2,845 men perished. Of these, 280, or 10 per cent, were killed in action, and 2,565, or 90 per cent, died of disease. Many thousands of others were stricken by disease, and though they may have recovered, and even though they may have gone out of the service with no apparent evidence of illness due to that service, they carried in their blood and in their system the ineffaceable marks of their sacrifices. Many of them were too proud, Mr. Speaker, to admit that they had suffered any physical disability as the result of their service. Thousands of them declined to undergo a physical examination upon their muster out—an examination which might have revealed disabilities—because they would not deign to put themselves in the position of laying a claim for the future bounty of their Government. This bill will help men of this stamp—the proud and high-spirited men who never malingered, who did their duty loyally and faithfully, with no hope of reward. Discharged as they were in the full flush of manhood, many of them were utterly unaware of the ravages which the fever and the hardships of campaigning had made in their strong bodies. Many of them have since collapsed, and find themselves in middle life outdistanced by the companions of their youth who were more discreet than they and who hung back while Uncle Sam was calling for volunteers. Let us now volunteer to help them in eking out an existence by granting the exceedingly modest pension which this bill provides. The bill is eminently proper, and I trust it will pass.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I supported the Spanish-American War veterans' pension bill on several occasions when it came before Congress and voted for it when it was finally passed and became a law. The veterans of the Spanish-American War, who will be the beneficiaries of this measure, have had less consideration at the hands of Congress than the veterans of any war since the days of the Revolution, and this measure partly makes up for our neglect in the past regarding these worthy veterans of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition. During the War with Spain there were no such things as allowances or allotments to the dear ones who were left at home, neither did these men have any of the benefits such as we gave to the soldiers in the World War under the war-risk insurance act, neither did they receive any consideration in the way of bonuses, and this measure is nothing but a relief act in the interest of those who in their declining years find themselves sick and incapacitated from earning enough to support themselves and their families during the remaining years of their life. As time goes on this great country is learning more and more the art of war and how to prepare for it. This was well illustrated through the handling of our boys under the selective-service act, and while there may have been some mistakes regarding conditions in camp and their location, on the whole everything was fairly satisfactory. It is only just and right that every consideration should be given to the men whom we took from their homes to fight our battles, both while the war is on in looking after them and their dependents, as well as to take care of the dependents of the men who died in battle or from sickness contracted in the service, and to see to it that the disabled men are given every consideration in the way of medical aid and rehabilitation so that they may be able to meet the struggle for existence.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I would like to ask the gentleman from California if he is not in favor of providing a pension for everybody.

Mr. NOLAN. In time; yes. I believe this country ought to pension its soldiers as provided for in this bill, and I also believe that we should pension the men and women that served the country faithfully and well in a civilian capacity, and I intend to vote for the Lehlbach retirement bill when it comes before the House. I am also in favor of an old-age pension, as I believe it would be better to take care of the men and women of the country who have given their life to toil through a pension system rather than throw them on the industrial scrap heap or send them to the poorhouse. Society should pay for its maimed, crippled, blind, and its aged people who can not take care of themselves, and in that respect I am in favor of a general pension bill. I intend to vote for this bill and trust it will pass the Senate and become a law.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended from five minutes to seven minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Will that close the debate?

Mr. SELLS. It will.

Mr. CANNON. Because I have got to go away at 3 o'clock.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to object to the request of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. I yield the time back, then.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and those who are in favor of suspending the rules and passing the bill will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 295, nays 19, answered "present" 1, not voting 112, as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I want to renew my request that all Members may have three legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all Members may have three legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

WATER SUPPLY OF LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 406.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 406, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 406) amending an act entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Los Angeles, Calif., certain public lands in California; and granting rights in, over, and through the Sierra Forest Reserve, the Santa Barbara Forest Reserve, and the San Gabriel Timberland Reserve, Calif., to the city of Los Angeles, Calif.," approved June 30, 1906.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, when the bill was up before I objected to it. I understand now that certain corrective amendments, satisfactory to the Committee on the Public Lands, and satisfactory to other Representatives in Congress from the State of California, are to be offered as amendments to this bill if consent is given.

Mr. ELSTON. I understand that certain amendments are to be offered, and I do not know positively that they will be, but an opportunity will be given to gentlemen to explain.

Mr. GARD. I understand these amendments are satisfactory to the proponents of the bill.

Mr. ELSTON. There is one minor amendment suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture which is acceptable. There are two amendments, as I remember, that have been proposed where consent could very well be given, but where it was suggested that the matter be explained to the House and that the House be given an opportunity to decide upon them. I could not for the author of the bill make any agreement of that kind.

Mr. GARD. I will state to the gentleman that unless the other proponents of the bill agree to the amendments that were offered in the Committee on the Public Lands by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] I will withhold again my consent.

Mr. ELSTON. I can not recall any amendment proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR]. I understand that since the bill has been reported to the House he has some amendments which, I believe, have been suggested. I suggested to him that the matter would not take long, and that he might place the discussion before the House and let the House decide. I regret very much that I am not in a position, having reported out the bill but not having introduced the bill, to accede to the gentleman's request. I do not believe that the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR], for whom the gentleman from Ohio is speaking, would insist to the degree that the gentleman from Ohio is insisting. I would like to have them say so if they feel that way about this thing.

Mr. GARD. That was my understanding as to the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR], and therefore, reserving the right to object, I ask that the gentleman from California explain his position.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I would state to the gentleman from Ohio that I have two amendments to offer to the bill, and with the opportunity to present these amendments it is perfectly satisfactory to me to have the bill considered at this time. One of the amendments, I understand, is not objected to.

Mr. GARD. State that one, if you please.

Mr. BARBOUR. On page 3, line 10, after the word "basin" insert the following:

And embracing Mono Lake drainage basin and Adobe Valley and Black Lake drainage basin.

That, I understand, is agreed to.

Then I have another amendment. On page 5, lines 7, 8, and 9, after the word "city" in line 7, strike out the comma and the remainder of lines 7, 8, and 9, down to the words "Provided further"; and then on line 3, page 5, after the word "heard" insert a comma and the words "and upon notice by the city within 90 days of such possible conflict."

The purpose of this latter amendment is to clarify the language of the bill.

The gentleman from Los Angeles, Mr. OSBORNE, now states that he will also accept that amendment. We have not heretofore agreed on the latter amendment, but the gentleman from Los Angeles now states that he will accept it.

Mr. ELSTON. With that agreement made between the two gentlemen from California who are most interested in the bill and who represent the territory covered by the bill, I should say that the situation seems very satisfactory.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman from California yield to me right there?

Mr. BARBOUR. I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] has the floor.

Mr. RAKER. What the gentleman has stated will meet the objections of the gentlemen who have telegraphed here to various Members of Congress regarding the bill. It will cover their amendments, which are found on page 135 and also on page 142 of the hearings. These amendments are agreed to by Mr. Finney and by Mr. Matthews, representing the city of Los Angeles and the irrigationists, as I understand it. Is that correct?

Mr. BARBOUR. That is my understanding of it. It does not, however, conform to the amendment they first submitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. RAKER. I want to get this statement straight in the RECORD. Is it the gentleman's view that the amendment now offered meets and is in accord with what was proposed before the committee and agreed to by the irrigationists and by the city of Los Angeles, through Mr. Matthews and Mr. Finney, which amendment is found on page 142 of the hearings?

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to know who is running this thing—these men out in Los Angeles or this House? I ask for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object for a moment, I hope the gentleman will not insist. We are just trying to determine whether these amendments are satisfactory to the parties concerned.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to find out from the gentleman from California, if the gentleman from Ohio will yield long enough, whether these men whose names he has just mentioned are running this question or whether the House is?

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] is a member of the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. I am talking about these men out in Los Angeles.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Matthews appeared before the committee. He represented the city of Los Angeles.

Mr. MADDEN. Who is he?

Mr. RAKER. He is the attorney for the city of Los Angeles and he appeared before the committee. Mr. Finney is a member of the board of appeals of the Department of the Interior, and he was before the committee and assisted materially in its work.

Mr. MADDEN. One man represents the Department of the Interior and the other one the city of Los Angeles?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And these two men have agreed to language that will protect the city of Los Angeles and also the Government of the United States. Is that right?

Mr. VAILE. And other interests.

Mr. RAKER. There were also present at that hearing Mr. Edgar and Mr. K. K. Fritz. The record shows that all these men before the committee agreed to the amendment which is found on page 142 of the hearings, which the committee slightly altered. I am asking now, so that I may keep our record straight, and so that proper legislation may be had, whether the gentlemen concerned have agreed upon it. Is the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR], in whose district the land is now situated—although originally part of it was in my district—satisfied that the proposed amendment now suggested will meet the wishes and protect the interests of the irrigationists, as well as give the city of Los Angeles proper water rights?

Mr. MADDEN. The fair presumption is that he must be satisfied with it or he would not be offering it.

Mr. RAKER. I am taking the proper course to present the matter and get it into the RECORD.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will state to the gentleman from California that I have a telegram from one of the representatives of the irrigation interests who appeared before the Committee on the Public Lands at the time of the hearing. He asked, first, that if possible we incorporate into the bill the amendment originally suggested, which at that time they receded from and agreed to accept another amendment which was prepared by the representatives of the Interior Department. The committee amendment is not in exactly the same form as that agreed upon at that time, but in this telegram he says that by accepting these amendments—that is, the committee amendment with the changes which my amendments will incorporate into it—the bill will be rendered much more satisfactory to him. I am now offering these amendments.

Mr. RAKER. I am asking the gentleman from California if it is his view that the suggested amendment proposed by himself does give the city of Los Angeles all it is entitled to and still protect the irrigationists?

Mr. BARBOUR. I believe it does. There is one change, however, in the proposed amendment. The irrigationists suggested a 30-day limitation, and that has been changed to 90 days, because it is not believed that 30 days is a sufficient length of time for the representatives of the city to come back here to Washington and be heard if there should be conflicting interests.

Mr. RAKER. Ninety days is a reasonable time. There is no question about that.

Mr. GARD. Are these amendments satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. ELSTON. I understand that they are.

Mr. GARD. Do I understand that the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE] and the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] agree to these amendments?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Los Angeles, Calif., certain public lands in California, and granting rights in, over, and through the Sierra Forest Reserve, the Santa Barbara Forest Reserve, and the San Gabriel Timberland Reserve, Calif., to the city of Los Angeles, Calif.," approved June 30, 1906, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That there is hereby granted to the city of Los Angeles, Calif., a municipal corporation of the State of California, all necessary rights of way, not to exceed 250 feet in width, over and through the public lands of the United States in the counties of Mono, Inyo, Kern, and Los Angeles, State of California, and over and through the Inyo and Santa Barbara National Forests, and that portion of the Angeles National Forest situate and lying west of range 6 west, San Bernardino meridian, as established by the United States public land survey, and that portion of the Sequoia National Forest east of the crest of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, in said State, for the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining canals, ditches, pipes and pipe lines, flumes, tunnels, and conduits for conveying water to the city of Los Angeles, and for the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining power and electric plants, poles, and lines for the generation and distribution of electric energy, together with such lands as the Secretary of the Interior may deem to be actually necessary for power houses, diverting and storage dams and reservoirs, and necessary buildings and structures to be used in connection with the construction, operation, and maintenance of said water power and electric plants whenever said city shall have filed as hereinafter provided, and the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, a map or maps showing the boundaries, locations, and extent of said proposed rights of way for the purposes hereinabove set forth: Provided, however, That the grant hereby made shall not apply to lands located in the drainage basin of Kern River or in that portion of Mono County lying north and west of the Owens River drainage basin, or to lands located upon Bishop Creek or its branches in Inyo County, or to lands in the Fish Slough Reservoir site in the counties of Inyo and Mono, in said State."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 2 of the act entitled and approved as aforesaid be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That on or before the 31st day of December, 1922, the city of Los Angeles shall file with the register of the United States land offices in the districts where the lands traversed by said rights of way are located a map or maps showing the boundaries, locations, and extent of said proposed rights of way, for the purposes stated in section 1 of this act, and there shall also be filed within that time all desired changes of location, the amended map or maps necessary to show such changes of location to be filed in the same manner and subject to the same approval as are the original map or maps of location, but no construction work shall be commenced on any of said lands until the map or maps have been filed as herein provided and until said map or maps and the proposed plan of development have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of any amended map or maps showing changes of location of said rights of way shall operate as an abandonment ipso facto by the city of Los Angeles, to the extent of such change or changes, of the rights of way indicated on the original map or maps: Provided, That any rights inuring to the city of Los Angeles under this act shall, on approval by the Secretary of the Interior of the map or maps and the plan of development referred to, relate back to the date of the filing of said map or maps with the register of the United States land office, as provided herein."

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 4, line 17, after the word "herein," insert the following:

"Provided, That during the period allowed the city of Los Angeles, for filing maps or applications under this act, the head of the department having jurisdiction over the lands, may grant easements or permits for rights of way, under any act of Congress now in force or hereafter enacted, for pipes, pipe lines, canals, ditches, flumes, tunnels, or reservoirs for the conveyance, delivery, or storage of water for irrigation, mining, or domestic purposes, or for the generation of electric power, including rights of way for the construction of power plants, towers, transmission and distribution lines, for the generation and delivery of electricity, if after affording the city an opportunity to be heard such head of department shall find that the easement or permit may be granted without destruction of or material interference with the works constructed or proposed to be constructed by the city, and for which application is filed by said city within 90 days from notice of the possibly conflicting application: Provided further, That all rights of way herein and hereby granted and all other rights of way hereafter granted under general laws, for the purposes herein enumerated, over lands within the operation of this act, shall be with the reservation of the power to thereafter grant other rights of way by easement or permit, conflicting with such prior grants or permits for the purpose of permitting crossing of rights of way or for limited distances necessary common use of prior rights of way, under such conditions as the head of the department shall find necessary and shall determine to be properly protective against interference with and not detrimental to the construction, operation, and maintenance of the works of prior grantees or permittees."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, lines 7, 8, and 9, after the word "city" in line 7, strike out the comma and the words "and for which application is filed by said city within 90 days from notice of the possibly conflicting application"; and insert, page 5, line 3, after the word "heard," a comma and the words "and upon notice by the city within 90 days of such possible conflict."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. OSBORNE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration, H. R. 406, is for the purpose of supplementing and carrying out the intentions of an act of Congress of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Los Angeles, Calif., certain public lands in California; and granting rights in, over, and through the Sierra Forest Reserve, the Santa Barbara Forest Reserve, and the San Gabriel Timberland Reserve, Calif., to the city of Los Angeles, Calif." The purpose of that act was to facilitate and assist the great and growing city of Los Angeles to acquire a water supply commensurate with its rapidly increasing population and needs.

The original act of 1906 was quite broad in its grants and provisions, as will be seen by reference to section 1 of that act, as follows:

That there is hereby granted to the city of Los Angeles, Calif., a municipal corporation of the State of California, all necessary rights of way, not to exceed 250 feet in width, over and through the public lands of the United States in the counties of Inyo, Kern, and Los Angeles, State of California, and over and through the Sierra and Santa Barbara Forest Reserves and the San Gabriel Timberland Reserve, in said State, for the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining canals, ditches, pipes, and pipe lines, flumes, tunnels, and conduits for conveying water to the city of Los Angeles, and for the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining power and electric plants, poles, and lines for the generation and distribution of electric energy, together with such lands as the Secretary of the Interior may deem to be actually necessary for power houses, diverting and storage dams and reservoirs, and necessary buildings and structures to be used in connection with the construction, operation, and maintenance of said water, power, and electric plants, whenever said city shall have filed, as hereinafter provided, and the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, a map or maps, showing the boundaries, locations, and extent of said proposed rights of way for the purposes hereinabove set forth.

It will be noted that not only was provision made for rights of way for conducting water from the mountains to the city, but also for "constructing, operating, and maintaining power and electric plants, poles and lines for the generation and distribution of electric energy," together with sites for power houses, diverting and storage dams, and reservoirs and necessary buildings and structures to be used in connection therewith.

The reason why provision was made for power purposes as well as a water system was that the expense involved in the construction of this great aqueduct, amounting to about $25,000,000 for first cost, was so great that it would have amounted to criminal waste and shortsightedness to have failed to provide for the extraordinarily favorable facilities for the generation of power afforded by a cement-lined conduit capable of carrying 20,000 miners' inches of water, dropping in its course from an elevation of 3,812 feet at the intake to nearly sea level. From the first it was well understood to be necessary, in order that the municipality should have a firm financial basis for its aqueduct bonds, of which $32,000,000 have been issued to the present time, that the marvelous power facilities should be utilized and eventually contribute to the liquidation of the bonds.

In the construction of the Los Angeles Aqueduct, which was completed in 1913, frequently it was found necessary to deviate from the granted right of way 250 feet in width sometimes only a few feet and at others for several hundred feet, generally because of economic or geologic reasons. The country through which the aqueduct passes is for the most part uninhabited, mountainous, and valueless Government land.

The purpose of the present bill is to correct the original rights of way, making them conform to the actual construction of the aqueduct. Where such changes are made the land originally granted and not actually used will revert to the Government. There is also granted to the city additional time—to December 31, 1922—in which to file additional rights of way for both water and power purposes, reserving, however, the full rights of all prior homestead, power, or irrigation claimants.

The fact that the United States Congress has greatly assisted the city of Los Angeles in the establishment of this great municipal water system by enacting the law of 1906, backed as it was at the time by the sympathetic favor and assistance of the then great President, Theodore Roosevelt, and that the Congress and the President will this year in all likelihood further facilitate it by the passage and approval of the amendatory bill now under consideration, may make interesting to the House of Representatives a somewhat detailed account of the inception of this notable and gigantic municipal engineering work. I sincerely wish that the great story might be set forth by one more gifted in description than myself.

First, I will take up the picturesque section of California—Owens River Valley, at the foot of its highest mountain, Mount Whitney, which is the source of the splendid water supply of Los Angeles.

THE TERRITORY.

Owens River Valley, although one of the most extensive and promising, from an agricultural standpoint, of the lesser valleys of California, is one of the least known. Owens River Valley, geographically, is more of a Nevada valley than one of California. The river from which it takes its name in its southern course parallels the main range of the Sierra Nevadas and has its source in and derives its waters from these grand mountains.

The Sierra Nevadas, throughout their northerly and southerly course, nearly 1,000 miles, are extremely abrupt on their eastern slopes and fall away gradually and gently to the west, toward the Pacific Ocean, several of the highest peaks rising abruptly from the plains on the eastern flank of the range.

The snowfall is extremely heavy on the high eastern side of the Sierras, and nearly every canyon carries fine streams of water throughout the year. These streams are veritable rivers in the spring and summer months, when the winter snows are melting. Thirty-five such streams empty into the Owens River from a drainage area of 2,800 square miles.

On the high and sequestered parts of the mountains the snows never entirely disappear, but are held from one season to another as living glaciers. Lakes of large size are formed by the waters from the mountains; lakes which have no outlets, like Mono Lake, in Mono County, and Owens Lake, nearly 200 miles farther south, in Inyo County.

To witness the enormous quantity of water that pours into these lakes one would think that, with no visible outlets, they would eventually cover vast areas. But by means of the excessive evaporation of a naturally dry country, which is said to amount to 90 inches per year on the surface of the lakes, the equilibrium is pretty well maintained, and while there is sometimes a rise for several successive years—and in Mono Lake I have seen fences inclosing former meadows covered 5 or 6 feet with water—lighter snowfalls are likely to reduce it in subsequent years to its former level.

One of the well-known phenomena of Mono and Owens Lakes is that they are excessively mineralized, the evaporation leaving the salts in the water. The result is that water that flows into the lakes as fresh and pure as it is possible to be, coming direct from the snows, quickly becomes brackish and unpotable; nor can it be used for irrigation or any other purpose, except that in a limited way the salts have been abstracted at Owens Lake. This lake has a superficial area of 75 square miles, while Mono Lake is much larger.

Owens River has a length of about 150 miles. Its waters are made up altogether of the snow waters from the Sierras. The valley itself is from 2 or 3 to 10 miles wide, bounded by the Sierra Nevadas on the west and by Inyo Mountain range on the east, and sufficient water flows in the river to irrigate all this valley, with an overflow into Owens Lake, where it performs no useful service, to supply a city of 2,000,000 people with an ample quantity for domestic use.

It was to this source that Los Angeles turned when it was foreseen that there might in the course of its rapid growth be a shortage in the indispensable water supply.

THE MAN.

Having described the place, let us take a look at the man, because with every big job there is a big man to carry it out. In the case of the Panama Canal it is Gen. Goethals. In that of the Los Angeles Aqueduct it is William Mulholland. Unlike Goethals he did not have the advantage of early scientific training. William Mulholland is a scholarly man, with a diversified knowledge of the widest range, but his education and engineering skill were not gained in schools or colleges, but were acquired by constant reading and study under most unfavorable conditions. His Irish parents conferred upon him a vigorous and rugged physique, a fine sense of right and wrong, and a humorous and practical turn of mind. A remarkably retentive memory enabled him to hold the knowledge that his habits of uninterrupted study brought to him.

William Mulholland, born in Ireland 63 years ago, came to the United States when 20 years of age, and two years later he arrived in Los Angeles, not essentially different from any other poor Irish lad, with $10 in his pocket and abundance of good health, optimism, and ambition. His first work was in assisting in sinking artesian wells. Six months later he became a "zanjero," or ditch tender, for the Los Angeles City Water Co., which at that time had a lease of the city water supply and furnished the city with water for domestic use and irrigation. It was his duty to patrol the open ditch which served Los Angeles and keep it clear of weeds and impurities. The first three years of his employment he had a cabin in the upper reaches of the Los Angeles River bottom, where he lived alone, faithfully watching the zanja by day and reading and studying engineering and other scientific books by night, reserving for sleep only such time as was necessary. He was advanced step by step until he became superintendent and chief engineer of the company. The growth of the city had rendered necessary a large equipment, and he supervised the job of reconstruction of the works. The lease of the water company having expired, the city resumed its control of the water system in 1902, and Mr. Mullholland was retained as chief engineer by the nonpartisan water board which was placed in control by the city.

A GIGANTIC ENTERPRISE FINISHED.

The completion of the Los Angeles Aqueduct marked the successful ending of one of the most gigantic struggles with obdurate nature in her most rugged aspects of mountain and desert and with powerful and subtle private interests for the possession of water that has ever been recorded in the world's history. The 10 aqueducts of ancient Rome were marvels of engineering skill and durability, but their construction stretched over a period of five centuries against the eight years that elapsed while the Los Angeles Aqueduct was building, and the length and dimensions of the ancient Roman aqueducts bear no comparison with those of that of modern Los Angeles. The longest of the Roman aqueducts was 62 miles, while the Los Angeles Aqueduct is 250 miles in length from the intake on Owens River to the city limits of Los Angeles. The irrigation aqueducts of the Inca Indians of ancient Peru, one of which was 360 miles long, are among the wonders of the world, especially so when it is considered that they were constructed by a people uninformed as to modern engineering science and its methods, but these undoubtedly exhausted centuries of time. The 350 miles of iron pipe line, 30 inches in diameter, which convey water across the arid plains of western Australia to the gold-mining districts of Kalgoorlie and Coolgardie, form one of the triumphs of modern constructive hydraulic engineering; but this construction, although in a hot and waterless country, was comparatively level, while the Los Angeles Aqueduct bores through miles of mountains of solid rock, crosses valleys on pillars of concrete in some places and through immense steel siphons in others, and is of vastly greater dimensions than the notable Australian structure.

A COMPARISON WITH THE CATSKILL AQUEDUCT.

The great Catskill Aqueduct to supply the city of New York is the only modern hydraulic enterprise intended mainly for industrial and domestic use that compares fairly with the Los Angeles Aqueduct. The New York Aqueduct crosses the Hudson far beneath the river bed, and furnishes the metropolis with less than 25 per cent greater quantity of water than does the California conduit at a cost, including its various reservoirs, of about $165,000,000. The Los Angeles Aqueduct is about twice as long, passes through an incomparably rougher country, and will cost when completed less than one-fourth as much as the great New York enterprise. The capacity of the Catskill Aqueduct is 500,000,000 gallons each 24 hours, while that of the Los Angeles Aqueduct is 265,000,000 gallons.

INCEPTION OF THE AQUEDUCT.

The present site of the city of Los Angeles was selected by its Mexican founders in 1781 because of its proximity to the Los Angeles River, from which it received its supply of water for domestic use and irrigation purposes. The waters of the river, a small stream ordinarily, but with an extensive drainage area, were granted in perpetuity to the "Pueblo de Nuestra Senora de Los Angeles"—the City of Our Lady of the Angels—by the Mexican Government. The first settlers numbered 44 humble pobladores or colonists from Mexico. They and their successors for the intervening 132 years, now comprising a city of a half million people, have drawn their supply of water—and very good water it is—from the Los Angeles River. The deep gravel deposits of the San Fernando Valley and of the coastal plain, gathering the saturation of centuries, constituted a reserve supply of importance.

The average rainfall at Los Angeles for a long series of years, as reported by the United States Weather Bureau, is between 15 and 16 inches. The seven seasons from 1893–94 to 1899–1900 were as a whole very dry, and yielded altogether but 68.77 inches of rainfall, or an average of 9.82 inches per year. The two seasons of 1894–95 and 1897–98 were average seasons, each with a record of over 16 inches; but the average of the other five seasons was but 7.16 inches. That this was no permanent condition, and that the pessimists who felt sure that "the climate is changing" were wrong, is evidenced by the fact that in the following seven seasons, from 1900–1901 to 1906–7 the total rainfall was 112.40 inches, or an average of 16.06 inches. During the "seven dry years," however, the flow of the Los Angeles River gradually decreased, while the population of the city and county increased very rapidly. The orange growers and other horticulturists and ranchers attacked the "reserves" by boring wells into the underlying gravels, and, by applying powerful gasoline pumping engines, secured an ample supply for their present needs, and very largely extended their area of irrigated orchards and cultivated lands. The season of 1903–4 was one of light rainfall—8.72 inches. A series of measurements made during several years by the United States Reclamation Service showed that the level of underground water had lowered very considerably. William Mulholland, chief engineer of the Los Angeles water department, in an address before the Sunset Club, an organization of men deeply interested in the welfare of the city, in the summer of 1904 set forth these important facts as to the diminution of the water supply, and the necessity of bringing in a largely increased quantity from an ample and unfailing source, if Los Angeles was to continue the great growth that it was then enjoying. He intimated that such a supply of pure mountain water had been found, and that as soon as options had been obtained for the purchase of the necessary water rights and lands the information would be made public.

GETTING THE "JUMP" ON LAND SPECULATORS.

Fred Eaton, a former city engineer, and subsequently mayor of Los Angeles, had spent some years of his earlier life in the Owens River Valley of Inyo County, and to his alert mind probably first occurred the idea of Owens River as a source of the permanent water supply of Los Angeles. He presented the subject to the board of water commissioners and to Chief Engineer Mulholland, and the latter was sent with Mr. Eaton to look over the ground. Upon his return Mr. Mulholland made a favorable report upon the project. It was then that a most venturesome thing was done by the board of water commissioners—an action which might be described as a "war measure"; one which a less courageous body of men, or one less firmly grounded in the sincerity of its own intentions and less sure of the final results, would not have ventured to do. Without other authority than their confidence that their action would subsequently be ratified by the people of the city, the board directed Mr. Eaton to obtain options on the excess waters of the Owens River and on all the lands in the valley that might be needed to carry out successfully the plan to divide the flow of the river, and transfer 20,000 miners' inches to the city of Los Angeles, 250 miles away. It was necessary that this delicate work of securing the options should be done by a private citizen, with as little publicity as possible, because if it had been known that the city of Los Angeles was the intending purchaser, the lands would have been advanced to a prohibitive price. Had the matter come regularly before the city council, this publicity would have been inevitable. Speculators would have secured options ahead of the city; prices would have gone skyward; and, in short, Los Angeles never would have received the water.

Fred Eaton, as one thoroughly acquainted with the valley and its people, was authorized to negotiate the options, and the water board advanced the amounts necessary to procure them. About 90,000 acres were optioned in this way, this acreage controlling about 260,000,000 gallons of water per day. In June, 1905, the public of Los Angeles was apprised by a simultaneous publication in the daily newspapers that it was the potential owner of 90,000 acres of land in Inyo County, 250 miles distant, and of a priceless right to a sufficient quantity of pure mountain water to supply amply a city of 2,000,000 people.

MONEY PROVIDED FOR THE WORK.

So well pleased were the people with the bold steps that had been taken by the water board, upon the recommendation of Chief Engineer Mulholland, that their action was confirmed by a popular vote in the ratio of 14 to 1 in September of the same year upon the question of authorizing bonds to the extent of $1,500,000 to pay for the 90,000 acres of land and water rights and for preliminary surveys and engineering investigations.

Chief Engineer Mulholland prepared the plans and estimates for the constructon of the adequct in 1906, and the city council authorized the employment of a board of three eminent hydraulic engineers to examine and report upon the whole project. This board consisted of John R. Freeman, construction engineer of the great Catskill Aqueduct of New York; James D. Schuyler, one of the engineers appointed by President Roosevelt to report upon the Panama Canal; and Frederick P. Stearns, former president of the American Society of Civil Engineers. They made a careful examination of the project, and on Christmas Day, 1906, they reported that they had been over the entire course of the proposed aqueduct, had examined Mr. Mulholland's plans and estimates, and they found them sound and practicable, and they agreed with his estimate of $23,000,000 additional as the cost of the aqueduct, exclusive of any expense for developing electric power. Six years was estimated as the minimum of time that would be required to conclude the work.

FIERCE ATTACK ON THE PLAN.

About this time there developed the fact that the aqueduct was not to be constructed without a bitter contest, all the more dangerous because the attack was from masked batteries. A half dozen or more projects sprang up, one after another, to supply Los Angeles with water from various sources at less cost than from Owens River. All these projects had been examined years before and found inadequate. There was delay after delay in fixing the time for the election on the issue of $23,000,000 of bonds. The report of the eminent hydraulic engineers was accepted by the great majority as conclusively in favor of the Owens River project, and finally the election was set for June 12, 1907. This was one of the most critical periods in the history of the aqueduct. A persistent and bitter campaign was made against voting the bonds, evidently inspired and fostered by powerful private interests. All sorts of arguments were used, often of a contradictory nature, but all intended to weaken the public faith in the enterprise. It was declared upon engineering authority that the cost of the aqueduct alone would be $50,000,000—more than twice Mr. Mulholland's estimate—and that it would bankrupt the city. The Owens River water was insufficient in quantity; it was impregnated with alkali; and it would all evaporate before reaching Los Angeles. It would take 20 years to construct the aqueduct instead of 6; the 50 miles of tunnels were impossible; and the gravity system of Mr. Mulholland was therefore impossible, and the water would have to be pumped over high mountains at prohibitive cost. To guard against the dangers from earthquakes two aqueducts would have to be built at enormous cost. Steel pipe throughout should be used instead of cement-lined conduits. Mulholland was a sagebrush engineer—he is now recognized as one of the great hydraulic engineers of the world—and he never had a diploma from any university or scientific school.

The Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce and other civic bodies, with a view to preventing a stampede of the people by these specious and adroitly presented objections, declared their belief in the Los Angeles Aqueduct and in Chief Engineer Mulholland's plan, and advised the people to vote the bonds. To the credit of the sound sense and courage of the people, they voted the $23,000,000 bonds, in spite of the vicious opposition, by more than 10 to 1; or, to be exact, by a vote of 21,918 to 2,128.

Legislative obstacles were encountered, however. The Government was asked to retain lands in the valley needed by the city, and this failing, a bill was introduced into Congress providing that in granting Los Angeles a right of way for the aqueduct over public lands the privilege should be confined to the conveyance of water for "domestic use." This restriction would have been fatal to the full use of the aqueduct. The Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce again took up the fight, and sent a committee of its leading members to Washington with Chief Engineer Mulholland and the city attorney to interview the President. Senator Frank P. Flint secured them an audience with President Roosevelt and the situation was frankly placed before him. The President took a friendly interest in what at once impressed him as a big, useful, and courageous enterprise, and his vigorous recommendation resulted in omitting the restricting clause, and Los Angeles was given a free right of way through Government lands under most liberal conditions.

The obstructors turned their attention to the State capitol, and an innocent appearing bill was introduced in the legislature at Sacramento providing for a minimum wage on all public work. Now, 80 per cent of the cost of the aqueduct was for labor. To have added 25 per cent would have increased the total expenditure $5,000,000. As $23,000,000 was the limit of bonded indebtedness of the city, this increase would have blocked the enterprise. The chamber of commerce and other public-spirited citizens went to Sacramento and succeeded in killing the objectionable measure.

These are some of the difficulties that Mr. Mulholland and his associates met, altogether unconnected with the physical and engineering obstacles, which were sufficient in themselves to have daunted less stout hearts.

LAYING OUT THE WORK.

The planning and the preparations for the building of the aqueduct were difficult and stupendous in their scope. Transportation facilities between Mohave and Owens Lake were confined to a rickety stagecoach. Water holes on the desert were 15 or 20 miles apart and water would have to be piped down from distant mountains. There was no timber for construction or fuel and, of course, no coal. Upon making up his estimates Mr. Mulholland found that the aqueduct would require a million tons of material and that 6,000 men would be necessary to complete the work within the time he had fixed. A railroad 120 miles long, from Mohave to Owens Lake, would be required to take the place of the stagecoach. Hundreds of miles of roads and trails must be built to make all parts of the work accessible. Cheap electric power must be installed for power shovels, dredges, and air compressors. The housing and feeding of the thousands of laborers and miners must be provided, with sanitary conditions. Telephone lines had to be installed for the full length of the work for communication with general headquarters at Los Angeles and all parts of the line.

A contract for transportation was made with the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., which provided that that corporation should build a standard-gauge railroad from Mohave, 144 miles north, to Owenyo, north of Owens Lake, where it would connect with the California & Nevada narrow-gauge road. This line was rapidly built in 1907.

There were 315 miles of roads and trails built and 150 miles of copper-wire telephone lines were installed, connecting the main office in Los Angeles with all parts of the work. Three hydroelectric plants were established, with a high-voltage transmission lines to convey the electric energy to the excavating machinery along the aqueduct and for lighting the many camps. Four water systems, with three reservoirs and 400,000 feet of pipe line, were made and used to convey pure water to the camps and places where needed.

THE AQUEDUCT CEMENT PLANT.

The proper quality of lime and clay to produce a good Portland cement was discovered at Tehachapi, and the city constructed a cement manufactory at an expense of $850,000. More than 1,000,000 barrels of cement were made and used in the work additional to that which was purchased from other cement manufacturers. This resulted in a large saving in freight and obviated delays from lack of cement in prosecuting the work.

CAREFUL PRELIMINARY WORK.

Two years were exhausted in finding the best and most feasible route, which was often changed by Mr. Mulholland and Mr. Lippincott for economic or other good reasons. Fourteen months were required for the enormous preparatory work which has been referred to. So that, with the execption of some work at the Elizabeth Tunnel and at the intake, the actual construction work on the aqueduct began in October, 1908. The wisdom of thorough preparation, even at the cost of considerable time, was fully vindicated by the rapidity and certainty with which it proceeded from that time.

THE AQUEDUCT.

The intake, which is constructed of concrete in the most solid and substantial manner, is situated 35 miles above the mouth of the Owens River to insure against the possibility of alkali solutions. Its elevation above sea level is 3,812 feet. The dimensions of the aqueduct vary greatly on different parts of the work, depending upon the physical nature of the country through which the water is passing. The first 22 miles is a canal, 62 feet wide at the water surface, 38 feet wide at the bottom, and 10 feet deep, uncemented, and at an elevation slightly higher than the river. This canal was excavated by three electric dredges.

At the Alabama foothills the aqueduct is conducted along the mountain side, passing Owens Lake on its western side and about 200 feet above the surface. This part of the aqueduct is concrete-lined, 30 feet wide, 12 feet deep, and 38 miles long to the Haiwee Reservoir, the first of the five great storing basins. This upper portion of the aqueduct to Haiwee Reservoir is the only portion uncovered. All the remaining conduit is covered with reinforced concrete slabs 6 inches thick. The conduit is lined with concrete from 8 to 12 inches thick.

South of Haiwee Reservoir the size and shape of the aqueduct vary considerably, and were determined by the topography of the country and character of the soil. The average size is 12 feet wide and 10 feet deep.

THE TUNNELS.

The enormous amount of work on the tunnels, their great length, and the rapidity with which they were driven are one of the most notable features of the aqueduct. All told, there are 150 tunnels on the line of varying length, from 100 feet to the great Elizabeth Tunnel, 26,870 feet, or over 5 miles long. All world records for tunnel construction were broken in this tunnel. The estimate of the board of consulting engineers was that one year would be required for preparation, four years for actual construction, and $1,913,000 as the cost. Work was begun simultaneously at both ends of the tunnel October 5, 1907, and 250 men were employed night and day in boring the mountain. An average rate of 11 inches per hour was made throughout, and the tunnel was completed February 28, 1911, in a period of three years seven and three-tenths months, and at a cost of $500,000 less than the estimate. It is the second longest water tunnel in the United States.

The total length of tunnels on the aqueduct is 52.035 miles, of which 43.129 miles are on the main aqueduct and 8.906 miles on the power system.

THE RESERVOIR SYSTEM.

There are five reservoirs on the line of the aqueduct, the largest being the Haiwee Reservoir, which is intended for storage, clarification, and regulating purposes. The capacity of the canal and cement-lined conduit leading to this reservoir is 500,000,000 gallons per day, about twice the capacity of the aqueduct below that point, and made so large for the purpose of carrying the excess flow in the melting season and accumulating a large reserve. The Haiwee Reservoir, which occupies a former channel of the Owens River, is now a large lake 7 miles long, with an area of 15 square miles and a storage capacity so large that in case of emergency it would amply supply the city of Los Angeles for a long period.

The Fairmont Reservoir is 127 miles south of the Haiwee Reservoir. Its purpose is for regulation rather than storage, its capacity being limited to 10 days' flow of the aqueduct. Its purpose is to regulate the flow into the Elizabeth Tunnel, through which the water will flow to the seaward side of the coast range. The reservoir covers a surface of 165 acres.

The Dry Canyon Reservoir is a small reservoir a few miles from the terminus of the aqueduct.

Two large reservoirs are constructed in San Fernando Valley at an elevation of from 1,100 feet to 1,200 feet above the city and are for the purpose of impounding the water just below the outlet of the aqueduct and to regulate the distribution. These two reservoirs mark the end of the Los Angeles Aqueduct proper. At the bond election, held April 15, 1913, the city voted $1,500,000 additional bonds, to construct a trunk line from these reservoirs, 28 miles to the city limits, where it connects with the city water mains.

CROSSING THE VALLEYS.

While the boring of the mountains for tunnels is sufficiently difficult, the task of carrying a great flow of water across the valleys is little less so. In many instances it is much more difficult. In some places this crossing the valleys was done by building the great conduit of solid concrete, supported by columns and abutments of the same material. More frequently, however, the valleys are crossed by means of enormous steel siphons, with a diameter of from 7 feet 6 inches to 11 feet, built to stand a pressure up to 350 pounds per square inch. There are on the line 23 of these siphons, crossing as many canyons, with an aggregate length of 12.06 miles. The only rock siphon on the line, that at Sand Canyon, on trial failed to stand the pressure and has been rebuilt of steel.

AQUEDUCT WORK CLASSIFIED.

A classification of the work as it has been carried out, extending from the inlet gates to the outlet on the rim of the San Fernando Valley, includes the following construction:

Classification:		Length in miles.

GENERATION OF ELECTRICAL ENERGY.

Aside from the sales of water for domestic use and the surplus, which for many years will be large, for irrigation purposes, it is anticipated that the most prolific source of revenue with which to meet the principal and interest on the bonds which have been and will be issued for the construction of the Los Angeles Aqueduct, will be the sale of electric energy produced by the waters of the aqueduct in their descent from an altitude of 3,812 feet at the intake to its outlet in the San Fernando Valley, 1,461 feet above sea level. The construction of the power plant is an independent operation from that of the aqueduct.

In 1906 E. F. Scattergood, the aqueduct's chief electrical engineer, made an estimate of the cost of development of 37,000 horsepower delivered at the city boundary at $4,490,000. April 10, 1910, Los Angeles voted bonds to the extent of $3,500,000 for the purpose of partially developing the electrical power of the aqueduct, which eminent electrical engineers estimate at 120,000 horsepower, peak load. It is not the intention to develop the full amount at this time, but eventually, as the demand for power increases, as it inevitably must, plants sufficiently expansive to develop all the power possible will undoubtedly be put in.

The first electric-power plant is 47 miles from Los Angeles, at Clearwater Canyon. The water plunges from the mouth of Elizabeth Tunnel 935 feet down the precipitous side of the canyon upon the power-producing water wheels, whence the power is transmitted to the city over high-tension lines. The plant erected produces 37,500 horsepower, and it can be increased at this point by additional construction to a limit of 75,000 horsepower. After leaving the wheels of the first power plant the water is carried 7 miles along the rim of San Francisquito Canyon and dropped down 512 feet upon the wheels of a second power plant. A third power plant, to develop a maximum of 10,000 horsepower, can be built between the aqueduct outlet and the upper San Fernando Reservoir, and still another power plant, capable of producing 3,400 horsepower, will be placed on the main trunk line to the city at Franklin Canyon in the Santa Monica Mountains.

THE GREAT ENTERPRISE JUSTIFIED.

A little more than six years have elapsed since the completion of the Los Angeles Aqueduct proper—one of the most gigantic municipal water-supply enterprises of America and one of the world's greatest accomplishments in engineering. Has the faith of the people of that great Pacific coast city, as evidenced by an investment to date of $32,000,000, been justified by the results? The remarkable growth of the city, both in population and in commercial importance, gives the answer. The census of 1900, taken about four years before the enterprise was conceived, showed a population of 102,000. Due at least in considerable part to assurances of an unfailing, continuous water supply, the population grew to 319,198 by 1910, and had reached half a million by the time the aqueduct was opened; by 1919 it had reached 600,000; and to-day 1,500 homes are being built there each month.

Los Angeles is now the headquarters and capital center for several lines of commerce of much importance. The citrus-fruit industry is one of these. The shipments of citrus fruits during the present season will approximate 50,000 carloads, valued roundly at $50,000,000. Los Angeles is also the headquarters of the petroleum industry of California, most of the large oil districts being in the southern or southern-central parts of the State. The oil production approximates 100,000,000 barrels a year, and the southern California oils are used for most of the power plants of the Southwest and for the transcontinental railways west of the Rocky Mountains, and oil shipments are made in tank steamers to all parts of the world.

Under the stimulus of an ample water supply the manufacturing industries have been increased enormously. In 1913 the total manufactures of Los Angeles amounted to about $150,000,000. In 1918 they had reached a total of $374,000,000. In 1919 they had a value of $618,772,250.

The imports and exports of the harbor of Los Angeles also throw light upon the growing importance of the city. From the first year after the completion of the aqueduct proper the imports were:

1915	4,159,306
1916	5,462,810
1917	8,043,242
1918	9,773,432
1919	16,165,628

The exports show still more marked progress:

1914	$2,069,983
1915	2,632,532
1916	4,341,553
1917	7,592,170
1918	7,625,390
1919	15,509,911

Thus, in the five years succeeding the opening of the aqueduct, imports through Los Angeles had increased by 220 per cent and exports by 649 per cent.

Among the great lines of business in Los Angeles is the unique one of the production of moving pictures. The climatic and atmospheric conditions are peculiarly adapted to the taking of moving pictures, and the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce recently published some figures on the subject, showing that 80 per cent of all the photographed screen plays produced in the United States are produced in and about Los Angeles. There are 40 large plants engaged in making pictures about the city and its suburbs, the plants themselves being valued at more than $12,000,000, and their pay rolls showing the employment of 10,000 people, earning more than $20,000,000 a year. Their output is estimated at a valuation of $50,000,000.

Recently there has been established in Los Angeles one of the largest rubber-tire manufacturing plants in the United States, involving the expenditure of many millions of dollars. The establishment of this great enterprise there was based upon many considerations, one that was deemed vital being the abundant water supply. One of the requirements of this tire plant is large quantities of long-staple Egyptian cotton, and many thousands of acres are producing this high-grade cotton in the Imperial Valley of California, in the Salt River Valley of Arizona, and in some parts of San Joaquin Valley, also in California. The locating of all these great industries has been influenced wholly or partly by the building of the Los Angeles Aqueduct.

Thus it will be seen that the adjustment here asked is for the furtherance of a great public work, one which benefits not alone the city of Los Angeles—for it is by no means there alone that the total imports and exports I have mentioned are consumed or produced—but all the surrounding country and, indeed, the whole Nation. The industrial development and progress made possible by this great work already are seen to redound to the advancement of all our people, and this profit they all will continue to reap increasingly. As my colleague [Mr. ELSTON, of California] has well said in his report on the bill, "This is not a money-making enterprise for private advantage. Thirty-two millions of dollars expended upon this great public improvement are represented by the bonds of the city of Los Angeles, and it is to meeting this financial undertaking and to the maintenance and improvement of the aqueduct that any money derived from it by the city is applied." [Applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. O'CONNELL, on account of the serious illness of his wife.

To Mr. BELL, for three days, on account of illness.

To Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HAMILTON, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. BROWNE, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the close of business on Wednesday afternoon the House recess until 8 o'clock in the evening for the purpose of taking up bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that at the close of business Wednesday afternoon the House take a recess until 8 o'clock in the evening. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is not at all material to me what evening we take up the Private Calendar. I think that many Members think it important that we have an evening for this class of business very soon. But at the suggestion of a number of Members I desire to modify my request and make it Thursday evening instead of Wednesday.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to follow the Calendar Wednesday work on Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. MONDELL. I think I shall at the proper time ask to dispense with Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. If the regular order is demanded, I shall have to object. I would not have objected if I could have had a chance to ask a question and have some understanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

DEATH OF SENATOR BANKHEAD.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to announce to the House the death of Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, the senior Senator from Alabama. SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 2, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God—

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting;
The soul that rises in us, our life star,
Hath elsewhere its setting and cometh from afar;
Not in entire forgetfulness and not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come from God, who is our home.

Such is the intimation of immortality. To-day we are brought to face once more the great question of life's final issue. We are called upon to mourn the loss of one of the eminent statesmen in this country, a man whose character was forged in the furnace of civil conflict, tested in the glare of public office, refined and beautified and glorified in the service which he rendered to our common country.

We thank Thee for the embodiment of all the elements of greatness that Thou thyself hast inspired in the leaders of our people. We pray that Thou wilt ever raise men to take the places of those who fall and to stand for the unchangeable principles of Thy Holy Word.

Bless and comfort the afflicted family. Give them the consciousness of the divine hope that ever abides in the hearts of the faithful. Help us to so discharge our duties as that when the summons comes to us we may enter unafraid into the presence of our God. For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. SMOOT, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ASHURST. I have this morning received a number of telegrams from stockmen in Arizona protesting against the so-called Kenyon-Kendrick bill. I present the telegrams and ask that they be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I would request the honorable chairman of that committee to read the telegrams to the committee when the committee assembles.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The telegrams will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present resolutions, in the form of a petition, signed by hundreds of citizens of Detroit, Mich., favoring the continuance and extension of the aerial mail service so as to include the State of Michigan and the city of Detroit. I ask that the resolutions be read, the names omitted, and that they be then referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The resolutions were read and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your petitioners, residents of Detroit, Mich., and of its suburbs, respectfully represent that we are familiar with and fully indorse the terms of certain resolutions adopted by the Detroit Board of Commerce on the 29th day of January, A. D. 1920, said resolutions being in words and form as follows:

"Whereas the newspapers have recently carried information from Washington that appropriations for the purpose of continuing and extending the United States aerial mail service were excluded from the postal bill, notwithstanding that Assistant Postmaster General Praeger was anxious to have said service continued and extended; and

"Whereas it is reported that Cleveland has advanced its time of carrier delivery of mail originating in Chicago or west of that point by 16 hours by the use of aerial mail service, and that Chicago by means of said service has advanced the carrier service of mail originating in New York approximately 24 hours; and

"Whereas Detroit, the fourth city of the United States in population and the third city in importance from a manufacturing standpoint is deprived of the advantages that accrue from aerial mail service; and

"Whereas Detroit has a greater interest than this purely selfish one, namely, an interest in the maintenance of America's lead in the science of aviation; and

"Whereas the establishment of the aerial mail service on a broader basis than the present one and the inclusion of Detroit would not only directly stimulate inventions and development in Detroit but would also further the progress of aeronautical science in the United States: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Board of Commerce of the city of Detroit, State of Michigan, That this board earnestly desires that the aerial mail service of the United States may be established on a broad basis and that the said service at as early a date as practicable be extended to include Michigan and the city of Detroit; be it further

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States be, and they are hereby, respectfully urged to make adequate appropriations for the continuance and extension of the present aerial mail service; be it further

"Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives from Michigan be, and they are hereby, urged to do their utmost to secure the continuance of the present aerial mail service, and also to secure the extension of said service to include Michigan and Detroit; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Senator TOWNSEND as chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and that copies be sent to each of our other Representatives in Congress, and that these resolutions be made a part of a petition to Congress, to be subsequently signed by leading manufacturers, citizens, and members of this board, to be forwarded to Senator TOWNSEND."

And we humbly petition for legislation to provide for the continuance of the present United States aerial mail service and its extension to include Michigan and Detroit. For this your petitioners do ever pray.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Drummond, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the public protection of maternity and infancy, which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 301, United Association of Plumbers and Steam Fitters, of Grand Rapids, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Sterling sedition bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Adelaide Fairbanks Wallace Tent, No. 16, Daughters of Veterans, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called Fuller pension bill, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ann Arbor, Mich., praying for the fulfillment of our treaty obligations with Korea, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Finance, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 5218) to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of magnesite ores and manufactures thereof in the United States (Rept. No. 458); and

A bill (H. R. 7785) to provide revenue for the Government, to establish and maintain in the United States the manufacture of laboratory glassware, laboratory porcelain ware, optical glass, scientific and surgical instruments (Rept. No. 459).

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 3999) for the relief of certain estates; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 4000) for the relief of certain estates; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 4002) to establish in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as the women's bureau; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

A bill (S. 4003) granting an increase of pension to James Dewey (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 4004) to correct the military record of Joseph B. Forbes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DISTRICT BOARD OF EDUCATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I introduce a bill to provide for the election of the members of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. I did not have time to read it, as it is very voluminous. I do not know whether I will approve of it or not. I introduce it only by request, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (S. 4001) to provide for the election of the members of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

METROPOLITAN POLICE AND FIRE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3748) providing additional compensation for the dependent relatives of members of the Metropolitan police or fire department of the District of Columbia killed in line of duty, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PRICE OF SHOES.

Mr. McNARY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 317), which was read and referred to the Committee on Manufactures:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to ascertain in every practicable way the causes for the increased price of shoes in the United States; the labor, material, and other costs; and the profits of manufacturers, wholesalers, jobbers, and retailers of shoes, and of the manufacturers, wholesales, and distributors of leather, thread, shoe machinery, and other articles required for the manufacture of shoes, with a view to determining who or what may be responsible for such increased prices. For this purpose such committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the recess and sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as they may deem advisable, and may employ a stenographer and such other clerical assistance as may be necessary. A report of the results of such investigation shall be made to the Senate, together with such recommendations for legislation as may be deemed necessary and practicable. The expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

WHEAT POOL.

Mr. REED submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 319), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas the Federal grand jury sitting at Spokane, Wash., on February 29 made a report containing certain charges against the United States Grain Corporation and its directors of reported speculations in wheat; and

Whereas an account of such report was, on March 1, made a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be directed to inquire into the reported wheat pool and investigate the United States Grain Corporation and its dealings, operations, speculations, and manipulations, if any there has been, of such Grain Corporation, its officers, and agents, in wheat and wheat products, and report thereon to the Senate, together with their recommendations of any steps which they may deem it necessary to take in view of the findings.

BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, a short article from the New York Commercial in reference to an appropriation for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

In presenting this matter I merely desire to say that I agree with that part of the article which deprecates the cutting down of this appropriation, which is only $487,470, as against $910,510 for the present year, a reduction of nearly one-half. It seems to me that at this time in our history we ought not to cut down the appropriation to build up foreign trade. It is absolutely necessary. We have a great merchant marine that we should aid in every way possible, and we can only aid it by having trade agents in foreign countries. I think the article is a well-timed one, and I hope the Senate will give attention to it.

Mr. SMOOT. The request was for unanimous consent to have an article printed in the RECORD?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is very short.

Mr. SMOOT. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, Mr. President, I will ask the Secretary to return the article to me.

BOLSHEVIST MOVEMENT IN RUSSIA.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, in the near future I hope to speak at some length on Russia and the proposed resolution recently introduced providing for recognizing the soviet government there. Among the many books, pamphlets, and addresses which I have studied none impressed me more than the memorandum on certain aspects of the Bolshevist movement prepared from original sources in the Department of State and transmitted on October 27, 1919, by the Secretary of State to the Committee on Foreign Relations. This memorandum is entitled "Bolshevist Movement in Russia." Its perusal will show that there is a fundamental difference between democracy and bolshevism, and such difference will appear in official Bolshevist documents, translations of which are appended to the memorandum. There are many in this country who have used the word "bolshevik" in a very loose sense. There are some who seem to sympathize with the bolshevik movement. We are all familiar with the phrase "parlor bolshevik." Are we familiar with the fact that Mr. Lenin reported last year that "the destruction of State authority is the aim which all socialists have set for themselves," and that "only a soviet organization of the State is able actually to disrupt without delay and destroy definitely the old apparatus of government of the bourgeoisie, the bureaucracy, and law courts"? How many know that he ridiculed attempts to unite the soviet system with a democratic system, and characterized as "yellow" and as displaying "deformed mentality" the Socialists and Social Democrats who proposed such union?

How many have read the proclamation issued last year calling the first congress of the Communist International, in which it is clearly set forth that "the present is the period of destruction and crushing of the capitalistic system of the whole world," and that "the aim of the proletariat must now be immediately to conquer power"? How many know that in this proclamation it was proposed that representatives of 39 groups should participate in the congress, and that of the 39, 3 are described as groups within the United States of America?

The memorandum of the Secretary of State has not received the study and attention which it deserves. There is no more important document on the subject of bolshevism. It should be widely circulated.

I now ask that the resolution be read, and I trust that it may be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 318), as follows:

Resolved, That 2,500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 172, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session, entitled "Bolshevist Movement in Russia," be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator to allow the resolution to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have no objection to that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 12 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.). Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to reservation No. 4.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, in view of the wide difference of opinion in this Chamber concerning the wisdom, the meaning, and the constitutionality of many of the covenants in the pending league, it must be clear to all of us that some of us are mistaken. If any Member of this body were possessed of infinite wisdom we would all be glad to follow his lead, but in his absence—and I think he is absent—we must do the best we can.

The wisest statesman of his generation once declared that all virtues, all blessings, all enjoyments, and all governments are founded in compromise, not with principle, I take it, but with pride of opinion and loyalty to party. It seems to me that a compromise ought to be welcomed at this juncture, provided it offers a fair test of the soundness of the claims of all the parties to the controversy—that is, a compromise which will separate the wheat from the tares, without injury to anyone, and permit the accomplishment of all that is wise and possible.

If the league is a menace to our country and will produce the undesirable results its enemies predict, this fact will soon be revealed, if it is ratified subject to the Lodge reservations. It will be revealed long before any irreparable or permanent injury can result to the United States. Under the Lodge reservations we can withdraw with honor and upon our own conditions if we find the experiment unprofitable, and such withdrawal will vindicate the judgment of the irreconcilables, so called. The men who voted against the recent resurrection of the league will then become the wise men of the West, if not of the world.

On the other hand, everything that the friends of the league claim for it can be had under the Lodge reservations, because the foundations of the international organization for the promotion of peace will be so securely laid that they will sustain any kind of superstructure that experience may justify. Indeed, the Lodge reservations could be much more drastic than they are and still leave an international association that could broaden its purposes and extend its powers as far and as fast as sanity and safety would warrant. Certainly peace by every means except war would be its guiding star, and wars could be had whenever they were wanted by the people who must wage them. If we do nothing, if we reject the league, the world will never know nor be able to identify the truly wise and great men in this body or elsewhere. The controversy will continue, and it will have a nuisance value of ever-increasing proportions. Every misfortune and discomfort from the untimely frost down to and including the high price of sugar and shoes will be attributed to the fact that we do not possess a League of Nations. This brings me to what I consider to be the real items of consequence in this discussion.

Mr. President, the American people want to do justice, love mercy, and walk as humbly with their Creator as hard winters and high taxes will permit. The American people want the world to return to and do business at the old stand, plus everything new that is desirable. We are not going to lose the flag if we ratify this treaty with the Lodge reservations. We are not going to war unless we want to. We are not going to do anything we do not want to do. On the other hand, we can do anything we want to do; we can agree to do anything the other members of the league want us to agree to that will invite peace and good will among the nations of the earth. We can all of us remember the terrible things that we were told would happen if we voted to give the President the extraordinary powers conferred by the Overman Act and the other so-called war measures of 1917 and 1918. We were told that in voting for them we were tearing the flag and the Constitution to tatters and feeding our civil liberties to the dogs of war, never to be regained. A majority of the Senate, however, refused to be terrified, and did the sensible thing.

The three things that are of paramount interest to us and all others just now are debts, taxes, and prices, and the greatest of these is prices. Nothing would bring greater harm to the industrial life of the world than a sudden and radical reduction in prices. I do not mean the exorbitant and extortionate prices for the exaction of which the responsible parties can not be too severely punished, but prices that are fairly comparable to the cost of production under the present standard of wages. Debts must be paid with goods measured in dollars. Cut the price of goods in two, and you will double the hours of labor required to produce a dollar's worth of goods; in other words, you will double the already colossal total of debts incurred in the prosecution of the war. It will be justly claimed that debts incurred at prewar prices can now be paid with depreciated or 50-cent dollars, principal and interest. My answer to this is that a sudden reduction of prices to the 1914 standard would so paralyze production that the payment of principal or interest of any kind of a debt with any kind of a dollar might be rendered very difficult for some time to come. Of course, prices should stop rising and gradually seek a lower level. Those whose incomes have remained tied to the prewar standard have a real grievance and deserve every consideration. I simply desire to emphasize the fact that all concerned, creditors as well as debtors, will find neither comfort nor profit in a sudden and radical fall in prices and wages.

The question of the hour for us to consider is, Will the League of Nations, if we join it under conservative reservations, put us in a position where we shall be the better able to help Europe maintain her industrial and political sanity, to the end that Europe and America can go to work and remain at work under a fairly remunerative standard of wages and prices until the colossal war debts are shorn of some of their existing terrors? There is very little danger of another international war in defense of militarism or the divine right of kings. I once read somewhere that for several centuries after the flood arks were deemed to be the prime economic necessity. Everybody that could afford one had an ark of his own, and the State provided ample arking accommodations for the poor; but after many years, as I remember the story, these arks were all remanufactured into pump handles, water being more useful than boats in the arid regions of Asia Minor.

It is not strange that in the year following the Great War we should all want to prevent its recurrence, but when we look at the real situation with candor we can readily see that another international war of the conventional type will be a physical, mental, and financial improbability for many years to come. Internal and domestic disturbances and convulsions are now the order of the day, and we should lose no time in our endeavors to minimize their intensity and shorten their duration.

We were a very happy people on the 11th of November, 1918. We were very proud of ourselves, very confident and courageous, and very grateful to our own brave boys and those of our associates whose sublime courage carried our arms to victory. This is no place for sentiment, but when sentiment, safety, and sound business principles unite to point the way to duty, why hesitate? A great many Americans in the hour of victory proclaimed that the cause of Belgium and France had been our cause from the first, and if this were true our obligations in the premises would be great; but let us take the narrower view. Let us admit that Belgium and France, and England, and Italy entered the war because they had to. They fought to save their lives, and for no other reason. We waited until we were attacked, and it became painfully apparent that we must help them or fight for our own lives without their help later on. Let us admit that it was "My country first," and "right or wrong," with them and us. Nevertheless, we fought a common foe and in a common cause, and if that cause was just, and it was, then our boys died that justice and civil liberty might be the portion of all men "everywhere"; that governments of, for, and by the people might not perish from the "earth." That is what the boys in blue fought for at Gettysburg. That is what fighting for America always has meant; that is what fighting for America always must mean if America is to remain worth fighting for.

And now, having won the victory over militarism and monarchism, and at heartbreaking cost, what are we going to do with the other subtle and deadly "isms" that threaten us? What do we propose to do with those who, in the language of Mr. Lincoln, look upon liberty as a license "to do as they please with other men and the products of other men's labors"? Prices will go down, production will cease, want and crime will be the sole heritage of those who entertain this definition of the word "liberty" if they succeed to power. This age-old conflict between reason and passion, wisdom and folly, has never been more bitter and the issue more doubtful than in the present hour, and in this conflict, upon the result of which the sanity and solvency and domestic peace of the world depend, the East again is forced to go to the firing line first and must bear the brunt of the battle. And if the East loses, it will be our turn next. It is quite possible that we have as much at stake in Europe to-day as we had in April, 1917. It is quite possible that the cause of every liberty-loving, justice-loving Slav and Frank and Latin is as much our cause to-day as Belgium's cause was ours in 1918. We may not use force except as force may be necessary to compel obedience to reasonable and just terms of peace with Germany. In my opinion we ought not to attempt to use force except as a last resort; but with every device known to reason and peace we can and should help the sane men still remaining in Europe retain their sanity, and, in my opinion, it will pay us in good morals and good money to do this.

This league, if it is based and grounded in the theory that reason is a safer guide to justice than force, if it is accepted subject to reservations which eliminate the possibility of the use of force for selfish purposes, will give us an influence abroad which we can not otherwise attain. If we join it for the purpose, and sole purpose, of helping our associates in the late war regain and retain their confidence in sound economic principles and the blessings of civil liberty, we may again turn the tide of battle and save them and ourselves from something worse than German bayonets. There is nothing in Washington's Farewell Address against such an alliance, and why the President and his followers should refuse to approve such an errand and purpose and ratify such a treaty and league will be for them to explain. There is not a man on this side of the Chamber who would have voted against such a proposition had it been presented.

This treaty has occupied much time, yet the great underlying principles involved are few and easily understood. In this adventure into world politics we have been most unwisely led and advised. Controverted points could have been adjusted without difficulty long ago but for the uncompromising spirit of a single individual. An international organization or concert of nations, willingly and voluntarily entered on the part of all who may desire, wherein the minds of the weaker and less experienced States may meet with the stronger and more experienced for the purpose of establishing friendly relations for their mutual benefit, and especially for the purpose of encouraging disarmament and settling disputes by arbitration and promoting industrial prosperity throughout the world, we can all heartily support. But any combination of nations that contemplates the use of force to carry out the recommendations of a handful of irresponsible politicians is a colossal blunder. As I have before remarked in this Chamber, if this league and treaty should be ratified upon conditions less conservative and safe than those contained in the Lodge reservations, Russia and Germany, if not all of central Europe, Japan, Mexico, and perhaps all of South America would soon find common ground to denounce it as an attempt on the part of the English-speaking peoples to dominate the world. And to defeat that purpose they will rally around the red flag or any other that promises success.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to offer two amendments, one to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and one to the reservation of the committee.

I wish to offer an amendment to the substitute of the Senator from Nebraska striking out the language "no member nation is required to" and substituting "the United States will not." As the substitute of the Senator from Nebraska reads it is:

That no member nation is required to submit to the league, its council or assembly, for decision, report, or recommendation, any matter which it considers to be in international law a domestic question, such as immigration, labor, tariff, or other matters relating to its internal or coastwise affairs.

Really, I do not think this statement is true. It says "no member nation is required." It seems to say that the covenant now does not require submission to the council of whether a dispute is a domestic question. We all concede that the covenant as written does require it. To relieve it from any ambiguity, and really to take care of the United States instead of interfering with the status of all members of the league, I suggest substituting the words "the United States will not," so that it will read:

That the United States will not submit to the league, its council or assembly, for decision, report, or recommendation, any matter which it considers to be in international law a domestic question, such as immigration, labor, tariff, or other matter relating to its internal or coastwise affairs.

Mr. President, I have already discussed a suggested amendment to the reservation that came to us from the committee, and I want to suggest this amendment, that in lines 5 and 6 of the committee reservation we amend by striking out the word "commerce." I submit that amendment at this time, although, having discussed it before, I do not wish to discuss it further.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if I correctly caught the reading of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, it merely substitutes for "all member nations" the name of the United States, so that the United States would not be required to submit, and so forth. Is that correct?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; and it does this further: It changes the word "is," which is in the present tense, and which might be construed simply to indicate an opinion as to what the treaty already does, and it substitutes "the United States," with the definite statement. I should be glad if the Secretary would read it once more.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish the Secretary would state the proposed change.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska the Senator from Georgia proposes to strike out the words "no member nation is required to," and in lieu thereof insert the words "the United States will not," so that, if amended, it will read:

That the United States will not submit to the league—

And so forth.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That makes it quite different. If the Senator would state that "the United States is not required"——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I do not think that is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The preamble then would read, in substance, that it is the understanding of the Senate in adopting the resolution to ratify the treaty that the United States is not required to submit to the league any of these questions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But we know that that is not true. The language of the eighth paragraph of article 15 specifically says we shall do it. I could not say that the United States is not required to do so, according to the provisions of the covenant, because I know that the provision of the covenant does require the United States to let the council pass upon the question as to whether a dispute is domestic or is not domestic. Here it is:

If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council, to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

So that the eighth paragraph of article 15 expressly confers upon the council the power of passing upon the question as to whether the dispute is or is not domestic; and I could not say that under the covenant the United States is not required to do so, because under the covenant the United States is required to let the council pass upon the question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I differ with the Senator from Georgia on that point. To my mind the section of the covenant to which the Senator refers merely outlines a limitation upon the powers of the council; but in adopting a resolution of ratification the Senate now proposes, according to the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, to use language about as follows:

That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification.

One of our understandings which we define and as to which we make a reservation is, according to the amendment which I have offered, an understanding that no nation shall be required to submit a domestic question to the arbitrament of the council. I would not have any objection to narrowing that somewhat if it would secure the Senator's support, so as to have it read:

That it is the understanding and reservation of the Senate that the United States is not required—

To do this thing. I think it is a mistake to narrow it, however, because I think what we demand for ourselves we should accord to every member; and I have no doubt that that will be the final interpretation of this section of the league covenant—that we not only demand for ourselves but accord to other nations the right to control their domestic questions. If the Senator would change his amendment so as to bring it within that phraseology, I should not object to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I could not truthfully say that I understand it that way. I do not see how anybody could understand it that way when the language is expressly to the contrary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator will say that if he votes for this reservation and for the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, because that is the language that is involved in the preamble—

Subject to the following reservations and understandings.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Some of them are understandings, and some of them are reservations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes. That language applies to my reservation just as much as it does to the reservation of the Senator from Massachusetts. It is an understanding and a reservation. There is no more logical reason why we should limit that understanding and that reservation to ourselves than that we should extend it to every member of the league; but in order to secure the Senator's support, if he would make it follow the language which I used, and limit it to the United States, I think there would be no objection to it, because that is then an understanding and a reservation, and that is what the Senator proposes to vote for.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. As I understand the word "understanding" in the preamble, it means the understanding arrived at upon the acceptance of our reservation; not the understanding that was had between the drafters of the treaty, but the understanding that is set forth in the reservation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The understanding which we assert as a condition of ratification. It applies no more to the reservation which I offer than it does to the reservations that are offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Except that some of them are constructions of meaning where the construction is reasonable, and some of them are definite withdrawals from obligations under the covenant where a construction could not possibly reach the extent to which we wish to withdraw; and my difficulty about following the Senator is that I can not truthfully say that the construction which he suggests is possible.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The treaty having been ratified by all the other members of the league and being in operation, I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he thinks that if his reservation were adopted it could be of any force or effect unless it were agreed to by the members of the league in accordance with the terms of article 26 of the treaty in regard to amendments?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it is my opinion that a statement of the meaning of the treaty as a condition of our ratification will go into effect if after we deposit our instrument of ratification no objection is raised against it by any ratifying member of the league.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When the treaty itself lays down the conditions of the contract that has been agreed to by those who have made it and are operating under it, and the contract itself provides how that understanding may be varied, how can anything that we say, affixing our statement that what we say shall be the understanding of the other parties unless they object to it, they not having become a party to that condition of ours at all, bind them except by our asseveration that it shall bind them? The contract itself provides how what they have reduced to writing and signed and sealed may be varied. Is it so that somebody who is not a party to the contract can, by merely issuing a bull to the wide world, change the terms of their contract and put them upon notice that their contract is changed unless they protest against our action?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is an assertion that we will not require of them something from which we explicitly exclude ourselves.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is more than that; and the Senator's basis for offering it proceeds upon the theory that he is not willing to confine the change proposed by him to ourselves, but he insists upon forcing it upon them, and he makes it so that any one of the other nations which is a member of this league shall have that same understanding as to its duty, and each one of them shall have it, not only as to its own duty but as to the reciprocal duty owed to it by its colleagues—and that by an outsider who has not yet joined the league at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall not attempt, of course, to answer the Senator from Connecticut; the Senator from Nebraska will do that; but it seems to me that amendment would simply mean that it was at the option of these other powers to accept our understanding and interpretation if they desired to do so. We do not force it upon them. It is at their option. They can take that position and assume that attitude if they want to. If they do not, then that is their affair; but, so far as we are concerned, they do take the position that we take ourselves.

I expect to vote for the Senator's substitute; but, if it is not agreed to, I would suggest changing it so that it would read:

That the United States understands that it is not required, and hereby declines, to submit to the league, its council, or assembly——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can support that amendment cordially if the Senator will submit it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall offer that as a substitute. I am inclined to think it would be better to put it on that footing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Florida will offer that amendment, I will withdraw mine, because I think it is better than mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida will state the amendment he proposes to offer.

Mr. FLETCHER. The question in my mind is whether the Senator from Nebraska desires a vote on his reservation first. This could be offered afterwards if his reservation is not adopted. I have no objection to offering it as an amendment to his reservation, if he does not object.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the way to get it before the Senate, it seems to me—to perfect his substitute—so that we can be in a position to vote for his substitute.

Mr. FLETCHER. If it is in order, then, Mr. President, I will offer that as an amendment to the proposed substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska—to strike out in line 1 the words "no member nation is required" and insert the words "the United States understands that it is not required, and hereby declines," so that it would read:

The United States understands that it is not required, and hereby declines, to submit to the league, its council, or assembly for decision—

And so forth, as in the other reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be, first, upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia to the reservation reported by the committee.

Mr. MOSES. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. So that it will read:

4. That the United States understands that it is not required and hereby declines——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the Secretary is not reading the amendment to which I refer. The one that I offered to the committee reservation was simply to strike out the word "commerce" from the list of domestic questions that are exempted.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Where it appears in the printed reservation No. 4, the Senator from Georgia moves to strike out the word "commerce."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will leave the amendment on the table to be called up when the treaty gets into the Senate and I shall not press it at this time. I should like to have it printed as an amendment to the reservation, but I will not call it up until the treaty gets into the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia withdraws for the present his proposed amendment as stated. It will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, of course I do not object to the withdrawal of the amendment by the Senator from Georgia, but I think it is a very important amendment, almost a vital amendment to the reservation. If the Senator does not offer it I propose to offer it myself, because it does seem to me that it is perfectly absurd for us to take the position that we reserve exclusive control over all questions relating to commerce and decline absolutely to submit any such questions to the jurisdiction or province of the League of Nations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I said, I intend to press it in the Senate, because I believe that perhaps we would be in a better position to succeed in passing it then than now, although I am perfectly willing to vote on it now.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it ought to be pressed now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Florida will give me his support I am perfectly willing to vote on it now.

Mr. REED. Is the pending question to strike out the word "commerce"?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia withdraws the amendment proposed and it is now offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. The amendment is to strike out the word "commerce," on lines 5 and 6 of reservation No. 4 as reported by the committee.

Mr. REED. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Sheppard
Ball	Gay	Knox	Shields
Beckham	Gerry	Lenroot	Simmons
Brandegee	Glass	Lodge	Smith, Ga.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is detained by a death in his family.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is absent on account of illness in his family.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Chair was somewhat in error as to the question before the Senate. The reservation which I offered as a substitute for the reservation of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has been before the Senate for several days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In what respect does the Senator from Nebraska think the Chair was in error?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Chair was proposing to have the vote taken upon a different amendment, which, it seems to me, should properly come later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are two propositions before the Senate, one reported by the Committee and the other offered by the Senator from Nebraska. Either of them can be perfected by amendment. The Senator from Florida offered an amendment to the original proposition and it is upon that question that the vote must first be taken. It will then be taken upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia to the proposition made by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. LODGE. There is no amendment before the Senate offered by me. There is the original proposition, and the Chair is quite right in stating that perfecting amendments are in order. The substitute is not a perfecting amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] has asked for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] proposes to strike out the word "commerce" from the reservation of the Senator from Massachusetts numbered 4, so that the commerce of the United States will not be designated as one of the domestic questions over which we maintain exclusive jurisdiction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida is to strike out the word "commerce" as it occurs in the copy in the hands of the Chair, in lines 5 and 6.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that is very desirable.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, a parliamentary question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If I understood the Senator from Massachusetts correctly, reservation No. 4 has not been offered to the Senate. I supposed that it was pending.

Mr. LODGE. It is pending.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understood the Senator to say he had not offered it.

Mr. LODGE. I offered the reservation several days ago.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has just stated to the Senate that he thinks it very desirable that this amendment should be adopted. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if the amendment is adopted whether he and his associates will vote for the reservation as amended?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am perfectly frank to say that I shall vote for the substitute to it which I offered, but I am like some Senators on the other side of the aisle—I am very glad to aid in perfecting and removing some of the errors in the pending reservation, even though I do not intend to support it.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator's substitute is not adopted, then may I ask the Senator from Nebraska if he and his associates, in case this amendment is adopted to the pending reservation, will vote for the reservation as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Many of us will. I do not know how many. I certainly will do so.

Mr. LENROOT. I am asking the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I decline at this time to publish a census of what the vote is going to be on this side.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. I am only going to say a word. The Senate might as well understand that this is a part of a plan of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to defeat all reservations. It is a plan, I charge, of the Senator from Nebraska to amend these reservations and then with the vote of the irreconcilables upon this side he expects to defeat the reservation entirely. For that reason I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I am paired with him during that absence. I find, however, that I can transfer my pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY]. I make that transfer and vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when Mr. NEWBERRY's name was called). The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] has a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. If the junior Senator from Michigan were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea." I ask that the announcement of this transfer may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. If present he would vote "nay." Also I announce the absence of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on official business. If present he would vote "nay." Also the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] is unavoidably absent. If present he would vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). Has the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. EDGE. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Ashurst	Harris	McKellar	Simmons
Beckham	Harrison	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Henderson	Nugent	Smith, Md.
Dial	Hitchcock	Overman	Smith, S. C.

Gay	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Gerry	Kendrick	Pomerene	Wolcott

Gore	Kirby	Sheppard

NAYS—44.

Ball	Fernald	Lodge	Reed
Borah	France	McCormick	Sherman
Brandegee	Frelinghuysen	McLean	Shields

Culberson	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.	Walsh, Mass.

Harding	Owen	Swanson
Johnson, Calif.	Penrose	Thomas
La Follette	Robinson	Underwood

So Mr. FLETCHER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to announce that, with consent, I will accept the suggestion made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], so that the reservation now pending will read as follows:

That the United States is not required and hereby declines to submit to the league, its council or assembly, for decision, report, or recommendation any matter which it considers to be a domestic question, such as immigration, labor, tariff, or other matter relating to its internal or coastwise affairs.

Mr. President, I take it that the reservation read in connection with the resolving clause will still retain substantially the same idea that I had in proposing my original reservation. The resolving clause reads:

That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings—

And this comes under that head.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator again read his reservation as now amended?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It reads as follows:

That the United States is not required and hereby declines to submit to the league, its council or assembly, for decision, report, or recommendation any matter which it considers to be a domestic question, such as immigration, labor, tariff, or other matter relating to its internal or coastwise affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall support the reservation of the Senator from Nebraska as now modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida withdraw his proposed amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am perfectly willing to do that, in view of the change which has been made in the reservation of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska modifies his substitute in the manner indicated by the language which he has just read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I only desire to say that I shall support the substitute of the Senator from Nebraska in its changed form because I think it is entirely satisfactory. If in the Senate it becomes necessary, I shall renew the amendment which I offered, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida, striking out the word "commerce" from the original reservation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Georgia, outside of the word "commerce," what is the difference between the two reservations now?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think there is practically none, with the word "commerce" out of the original reservation.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that that is the view of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] also?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not speaking for the Senator from Nebraska. I was only speaking for myself.

Mr. BORAH. I merely wanted to know the difference between the two reservations. As I heard the amended reservation read from the desk, the only difference is the word "commerce" being left out, as it was attempted to be taken out by a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has just declined to strike out the word "commerce."

Mr. BORAH. So I understand. Now, as I understand, the reservation presents the question in another form. I understand that the Senator from Georgia says the reservation as now offered is practically the same. I take it that the Senator from Georgia means, then, that it is the same except in the mere matter of verbiage?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it is sufficiently effective. I should be glad to lay the two reservations down side by side and compare them word for word before I undertook to express an exact opinion. I shall, however, vote for this reservation, and if it does not carry, I intend to vote for the other reservation. I intend to vote to strike out the word "commerce" from it; and if that word is not stricken from the reservation I intend to vote for it anyway. In other words, I desire to say to the Senator from Idaho that my purpose is to seek to bring reservations as nearly as I can to what I think they should be, and then to support them.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to say that I think there are very substantial differences between the two reservations, but I do not want to take time to go into them, as I shall be glad if we can have a vote.

Mr. BORAH. The reservation as now presented by the Senator from Nebraska reads:

That the United States is not required, and hereby declines, to submit to the league, its council or assembly, for decision, report, or recommendation, any matter which it considers to be a domestic question, such as immigration, labor, tariff, or other matter relating to its internal or coastwise affairs.

I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia what effect would this reservation have upon the commerce through the Panama Canal, and what effect would it have in bringing the Panama Canal under the jurisdiction of the League of Nations?

From a hurried examination of the reservation which has now been offered by the Senator from Nebraska, in my opinion it would put the control of the Panama Canal under the jurisdiction of the council of the League of Nations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Such a thought never occurred to me, and I do not possibly think it could be justified. I would give serious consideration to any suggestion on a legal question that might come from the Senator from Idaho; but I do not see how what he suggests could possibly happen.

Mr. BORAH. I think it is worth considering.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. It is rather an important matter, it occurs to me, Mr. President; and rather than try to interpret it in this way, would it not be the correct proceeding to request the Senator from Nebraska to state wherein the difference between the two reservations may lie?

Mr. BORAH. I should be very glad to hear the Senator from Nebraska, but I have some ideas of my own on the subject.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very glad the attention of the Senate has been specifically attracted to the matter of the use of the word "commerce." I want to say a word about that directly; but, first, I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho if commerce through the Panama Canal would be thrown under the jurisdiction of the league by the exclusion of the word "commerce," would not commerce on the Hudson River be within the jurisdiction of the league by the same force of reasoning; also commerce on Chesapeake Bay, on the Delaware Bay to the city of Philadelphia, and up the Mississippi River to St. Louis? What is the difference between those highways and the Panama Canal, so far as the jurisdiction of the league is concerned?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me to endeavor to answer the question of the Senator from Montana, I will call his attention to the fact that, with the single exception of our coastwise trade, all of the commerce through the Panama Canal is foreign commerce, while none of the commerce upon the Hudson River or the Chesapeake Bay is foreign commerce, except in the sense that ships from other countries are allowed to enter our ports on those waterways.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can hardly understand that. Ships land in the city of Philadelphia from all parts of the world, as I understand.

Mr. KNOX. That is exactly what I said; but they land subject to our harbor and port regulations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; so they also go through the Welland Canal and into the Great Lakes and clear on to the city of Chicago. What is the difference between the commerce through the Panama Canal and the other commerce, except, possibly, the proportion of foreign commerce through the canal exceeds the domestic commerce, while in the other case perhaps the domestic commerce exceeds in proportion the international or foreign commerce?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is one obvious distinction between commerce through the Panama Canal and commerce on the Hudson River and the Chesapeake Bay. Commerce, we will say, from London to the Straits Settlements, touching at no intervening port, might pass through the Panama Canal, constituting commerce between two foreign ports, whereas the foreign commerce on the Hudson River and the Chesapeake Bay is commerce between a port of the United States and a foreign port.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but let me remind the Senator that commerce from Liverpool to Fort William on Lake Superior passes through Sault Ste. Marie. Now, what is the difference between the Panama Canal and Sault Ste. Marie and the other waterways?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I frankly confess that the idea of the Panama Canal passing under the jurisdiction of the League of Nations was not entirely original with the Senator from Idaho. I was reading a comment in an English paper a few days ago upon our reservations, and, amongst other things, the consolation which they derived from the reservations was that they would undoubtedly leave the council of the League of Nations control over the Panama Canal. I am always interested in anything those men suggest in regard to these matters, because they have a great faculty for looking after their own interests, and I have observed since the armistice was signed that they have uniformly been successful. I may be in error, but I know that that opinion prevails in very high quarters in England, and it is certainly a matter of considerable moment to our people, in view of the fact that there has been a very large body of people in this country ever since the Panama Canal was built who wanted to turn it over to the control of the British Government entirely; in fact, they are the same class of people who regret that their ancestors ever came to this country at all.

Mr. President, speaking about domestic questions, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that so far as I know there has not been a single question raised since the League of Nations was attempted to be organized upon which the council has endeavored to take jurisdiction that has not been essentially a domestic question; every question with which the League of Nations is attempting to deal in Europe to-day is essentially a domestic question, and, as stated by a distinguished writer of Belgium a few days ago, unless the league could deal with domestic questions it would, as an organization, be utterly useless and worthless to Europe. All the matters which they have taken up with reference to Russia and with reference to the affairs over which they have assumed control have been domestic questions. They take charge of them and deal with them and effectuate plans which have nothing to do with other matters than those of the internal concerns of nations.

I read in the New York Sun this morning that the league is to be asked to control the world's supply of oil.

In view of the fact that the English Government to-day owns or dominates or controls 95 per cent of the oil supply of the world, I can see what is meant when it is said that the League of Nations is to take control of the oil supply of the world. A report made to the British Parliament within the last few weeks by an expert of the English Government stated that the English Government now dominated or controlled, directly or indirectly, from 95 to 98 per cent of the oil supply of the world, and stated, furthermore, that in less than 10 years the United States would be paying the English Government $1,000,000,000 a year for its oil supply. I see this morning that the council of the League of Nations, and the assembly combined I presume, if a dispute shall arise, are to be asked to fix the control, the supply, and the price, I presume, of the oil which is to be furnished the world.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator is in error in saying that the British Government now controls 95 per cent of the oil output. He probably means of the oil territory of the world, or territory which is known or supposed to be capable of producing oil. The United States still leads in the production of oil, but in Mesopotamia, Persia, and other countries acquired by Great Britain there are supposed to be vast oil territories; and I have seen the statement that England expected to derive enough oil from Mesopotamia to liquidate in large part the debts of the war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the article which I have read, and which I have in my possession, goes into detail and states the control of the English people over the oil supply of the world. It may not cover the actual output at this particular time, but it does state, in so many words, that in less than 10 years, according to the situation as it has now developed, the United States will have to pay England $1,000,000,000 a year for her necessary oil supply.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The statement of the Senator is very interesting.

Mr. BORAH. It is interesting.

Mr. PITTMAN. But if we have control of the Panama Canal at the present time, as I think we have, I do not see why England, controlling 95 per cent of the oil of the world, with a prospect of controlling more in the near future, as the Senator suggests, could be any more desirous of turning the control of oil over to the League of Nations than we should be desirous of turning the Panama Canal over to the League of Nations.

Mr. BORAH. I can see it. It is because there is nothing to the League of Nations except England. That great people are running it now, and they will continue to run it.

Mr. PITTMAN. She certainly would not be any better off if she turned it over to the League of Nations than if she kept it herself.

Mr. BORAH. She would be infinitely better off, because she would not have to assume to do that which she is doing, which has always been her policy, as now in the case of Fiume; in other words, it would be much better for John D. Rockefeller if he could have the Senator from Nevada, the Senator from Missouri, and the Senator from Idaho fix the price upon his oil if he were going behind the curtains to name what that price should be.

Mr. PITTMAN. I see the Senator's point, of course; but I really could not follow him for a while, when he was trying to prove that England, while herself controlling all the oil supply of the world—or would control it pretty soon—should desire to have anyone else meddling with it at all—the League of Nations or anyone else.

Mr. BORAH. I have never discovered that England objects to anybody meddling if she controls the meddler.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator think England will consult anyone when she obtains control of 95 per cent of the oil of the world?

Mr. BORAH. I will venture to say that if the Senator will take the report which I will furnish him and read it he will be startingly surprised at the manner in which England has taken control of the great oil fields of the world since the armistice was signed.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am aware of the fact that England is accumulating the control of oil all over the world; she is doing so without consulting any other country, and, so far as I know, she is doing it legally; and doing legally what she is doing, it seems to me that the Senator has rather strained his argument in his attack on the League of Nations to quote from a newspaper article, and say that England is desirous of turning the oil control over to the League of Nations while she already controls the oil supply.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. REED. If I may be permitted, I should like to make two suggestions. The figures which the Senator suggests as coming from a British source or similar figures have been in my possession, furnished to me by a former employee of our own Government, working, I believe, in the Bureau of Mines. The figures were startling and bear out what the Senator states.

The second suggestion I have to make is this: It is pretty well known that Great Britain has acquired for her Government, either directly or through her agencies, vast oil territories in Mexico. It might be highly desirable, in the event of a disturbance between the United States and Mexico, for Great Britain to protect her oil supplies through the instrumentality of the League of Nations, in that way asserting a control over a dispute essentially American, and coming under the Monroe doctrine, but at the same time employing the League of Nations to intervene in the matter.

I take it that as Great Britain owns oil all over the world, in other countries, that is just what she wants the League of Nations to do. She wants to employ the League of Nations constantly to protect the distribution of that oil.

It seems to me the two ideas run absolutely along parallel lines, and that they are not in conflict.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, having discovered the difference between the two amendments, I am ready to vote.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho to print in the RECORD the report to which he refers.

I wish to add to that the statement that there can be no doubt of Great Britain's fixed purpose to monopolize the oil supply and the sources of oil supply in the world, so far as that is practicable. The statement has been made in the public prints that Great Britain to-day will not permit Americans to prospect in Mesopotamia or in Persia, and I believe Secretary Lane, in his last annual report, urged the necessity of some sort of international arrangement under which Americans would be permitted to prospect and exploit oil in British territories and in other territories of the world.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, to cite a specific instance, in order that by having an object lesson the question may be somewhat clearer, British interests own a great deal of oil in the ground in Mexico. Various controversies have arisen in regard to taxes upon that oil, and in regard to its exportation. Under the Monroe doctrine those questions, in so far as they affect interposition with the Government of Mexico, are subject to the application of the Monroe doctrine, and in the administration of the Monroe doctrine the United States is the ultimate arbiter of those questions so far as Europe is concerned. Now, if by the adoption of the League of Nations Great Britain can transfer the jurisdiction of that international dispute, or any such dispute, from the United States of America, a rival naval power, to a league of nations in which she has six times as many votes as anybody else, her interest in it is quite obvious.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have been interested in the discovery announced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that this league is to be under the control of Great Britain. I have been interested in it, because he seems to differ radically from two of his very ardent colleagues numbered among the irreconcilables, like himself. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] spent an afternoon here in demonstrating to us that the league was to be under the control of the Pope of Rome, as most of the nations belonging to the league were of the Catholic faith. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] spent some hours here, at one time or another, in demonstrating that the league was to be under the control of the colored nations of the world, and he introduced very interesting ethnological information here to demonstrate that contention. Now, I understand from the Senator from Idaho that in some mysterious way the league is to be under the control of Great Britain; and I suggest that it might add force and effect to the arguments which are presented if the irreconcilable Senators, opposed to any league, could in some way agree among themselves as to who really is to dominate it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is only one thing upon which the irreconcilables are absolutely agreed among themselves, and that is that the United States is not going to control the league.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I had intended to address an inquiry to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], but in his absence I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The idea was expressed on the floor on yesterday, and I know that is the general view, that by the enumeration of these various subjects in this particular reservation—namely, immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, and so on—these subjects are entirely withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the league and all questions in relation to them. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if it is his understanding that all questions in relation to commerce are thus withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the league?

Mr. LODGE. I did not quite understand the Senator's question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I stated that it is the very general view that by this reservation all of the particular subject matters referred to in this reservation—that is to say, immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, and so forth—are entirely withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the league and all questions in relation to them. I believe it is the general view that these matters ought to be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the league, because it is contended that immigration is a purely domestic question, that labor is a purely domestic question, that coastwise traffic is a purely domestic question, and that the tariff is a purely domestic question; but when we come to commerce everybody must recognize that a vast number of questions in relation to commerce are international in character. Now, if all questions in relation to commerce are withdrawn, I do not imagine that any friend of the league would desire that result, and I ask the Senator if that is his understanding of it? I will say to the Senator, in explanation of my inquiry, that it is not my understanding.

Mr. LODGE. The question which the Senator from Montana has been putting is so long and has been stretched out so far that I am not sure that I know just what it is, but I will try to explain what I think about the matter.

The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction.

There is no question about that. That is perfectly plain. I like it because it is plainer than the somewhat misty substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska. We are to decide what is a domestic question. We can decide that in any case. Now, it goes further and says:

And declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including—

Certain ones which are enumerated—

are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States.

It seems to me that is perfectly plain. The enumerations are simply by way of illustration and example. Commerce is undoubtedly there if we declare it to be domestic.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very sure that the fault is mine in stating the question, but the Senator apparently has not appreciated the idea on which I am seeking information. I said to the Senator that it is the general view that by virtue of this language all questions relating to these particular subjects are withdrawn from the operation of the league.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and any other subject that the United States declares to be domestic.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; so I inquire of the Senator, is it his understanding that all questions relating to commerce are withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the league?

Mr. LODGE. They are all withdrawn, if we choose to withdraw them, and if they wholly or in part relate to our internal affairs.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I understand the Senator to say that all questions in relation to commerce are not withdrawn, but only those questions touching commerce that relate to our internal affairs?

Mr. LODGE. That relate wholly or in part to our internal affairs, or which are decided by us to be domestic questions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the substitute for reservation No. 4.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. REED. I ask to have the substitute stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, will be stated.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

4. That the United States is not required, and hereby declines, to submit to the league, its council or assembly, for decision, report, or recommendation, any matter which it considers to be a domestic question, such as immigration, labor, tariff, or other matter relating to its internal or coastwise affairs.

Mr. REED. I desire to inquire by whom that is offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made a short time ago with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on the business of the Senate. He is investigating now the recent murders that took place in Arizona by Mexican bandits.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). Making the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. If present, he would vote "nay."

I also announce the absence of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on official business. If present, he would vote "nay."

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] is unavoidably absent, and is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. If present, the Senator from Ohio would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 44—as follows:

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment, as modified in the nature of a substitute for reservation No. 4, was rejected.

Mr. LODGE (at 2 o'clock p. m.). I ask for a vote on reservation No. 4.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon reservation No. 4 as reported by the committee. The unanimous-consent agreement is now in operation and debate is out of order.

Mr. KING. I desire to offer a substitute for the reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute is in order and it will be read.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

4. The United States understands that the jurisdiction and authority of the council or the assembly of the league do not include any power over the proper domestic, internal, or national policy of any member of the league, and that said articles do not confer upon the league any powers with respect to immigration, imposts, property, inheritance, naturalization, citizenship, labor, coastwise traffic, or any other matter of proper domestic policy. This enumeration of matters of policy shall not in any wise be taken to exclude from the authority of the United States any other subject of domestic policy properly within the national political powers and sovereignty of the United States, as recognized by the law and custom of nations. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to consideration of the council any question which in its judgment is a question within its domestic jurisdiction and sovereignty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute, which has just been read.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to reservation No. 4 as reported by the committee.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with reference to my pair that I made a while ago, I vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S name was called). The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness. If present, on this question, he would vote "yea."

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). I make the same announcement as before. My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I am informed, however, that as to this reservation he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and its transfer to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with whom I have a general pair, is absent on account of illness. I transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the affirmative). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 56, nays 25, not voting 14, as follows:

YEAS—56.

So reservation No. 4, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, was agreed to, as follows:

4. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move the adoption of reservation No. 5.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read reservation No. 5.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

5. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the League of Nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As a substitute for that reservation, I tender the reservation which I offered on a former occasion covering the same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Assistant Secretary. In lieu of the reservation proposed as read, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Hitchcock] moves to substitute the following:

5. That the national policy of the United States known as the Monroe doctrine as announced and interpreted by the United States is not in any way impaired or affected by the covenant of the League of Nations and is not subject to any decision, report, or inquiry by the council or assembly.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President I need hardly call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this changes vitally the reservation. It affects, to mention only one case, the statement "said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone." That statement is a declaration for the future and carries out the unbroken history of the United States. It has never been interpreted by anyone but the United States. I attach very great importance to that declaration, because the delegation at the peace conference from Great Britain published officially a statement in which they declared that there was no question of doubt that the interpretation of the Monroe doctrine was to be decided by the league. That statement, I think, ought to be met in language which can not possibly be misunderstood.

The Monroe doctrine is our policy. It was declared for the purpose of protecting the safety and well-being of the United States. It was not issued disguised in any trappings of altruism. It was of great benefit to some of the South American States, and they have taken advantage of it on more than one occasion, but it is an American doctrine. It is, with one exception, to my mind the most absolutely vital thing involved in the question of the league.

The fifth reservation has received the closest inspection and care. I hope the Senate will adopt it as it stands. To me the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine without any possibility of misunderstanding is absolutely vital. I said when I spoke in the Senate in August last that it was one of the things which, if it was impaired, would make it absolutely impossible for me to vote for the treaty, and I have not changed my opinion in that respect.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I believe that the United States should construe the Monroe doctrine from time to time, and I believe it will. That has been the policy of the United States. But for us to require that all other countries shall agree in advance to our construction and generally commit themselves to our authority to pass upon it is to ask from them a concession that I think goes beyond reason. I fear that such language would not be pleasing to our South American friends. I do not consider such language necessary. All we really need to do is to declare that neither the council nor the assembly nor the League of Nations shall have the right to interfere at all with us in our long-established policy known as the Monroe doctrine. What we wish is to keep this new covenant from doing us any harm in that regard.

I can not account for the singular language in the covenant with regard to the Monroe doctrine. It is difficult to conceive of a student of the Monroe doctrine putting such language into the covenant as a reservation. It is, to say the least, awkward, ill-advised, if not somewhat intentionally misleading.

But while I am opposed to permitting the council or the assembly in any way to interfere with our action in reference to the Monroe doctrine, it seems to me that if we take ourselves out from under the league in any way and leave ourselves with reference to the Monroe doctrine just where we were before the conferences began over the league at Paris we will have accomplished all we really require. I am just afraid that we go too far when we ask the balance of the world to concede that we shall have the right to construe it for ourselves.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to say merely a word or two on the point in reference to the South American States. The Monroe doctrine is not their doctrine. Incidentally, it was of great value to them when it was enunciated, because the contest of the South American colonies then being carried on against Spain involved a question which affected all Europe, and which was of great moment, of course, to the colonies themselves. I repeat, it is not their doctrine; it is ours. They have never attempted to interpret it. Sometimes they reject it and denounce it, as Carranza has lately done, and sometimes they run to its shelter, as Mexico did after the Civil War, and as Venezuela did only a comparatively few years ago.

It is for us alone to interpret this doctrine. We are claiming here nothing more than we have always claimed; but if, after that claim has been put into a reservation adopted by the Senate, it is stricken out, it would be equivalent to saying to all the world that we are not prepared to interpret the doctrine alone; and, if it has not yet been said to all the world that we alone interpret the Monroe doctrine, the time has now come to say it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the peculiar wording of this amendment. Without speaking of it harshly, I think it is utterly and absolutely without any meaning whatsoever; and that is the mildest language I can employ to describe it. First let me call attention to the reservation itself. The reservation reads:

The United States will not submit to inquiry by the assembly or the council of the League of Nations, provided for in said treaty, any questions which, in the judgment of the United States, depend upon or relate to the long-established policy commonly known as the Monroe doctrine.

That deals with the subject matter of disputes; it refers to the controversies that may arise; it states we will not submit those controversies if, in our judgment, they come under the Monroe doctrine; and that we will decide that for ourselves. Now, notice the peculiar language of this very peculiar amendment which is offered. I read:

That the national policy of the United States, known as the Monroe doctrine, as announced and interpreted by the United States, is not in any way impaired or affected by the covenant of the League of Nations and is not subject to any decision, report, or inquiry by the council or the assembly.

That is to say, we refuse to submit the policy of the Monroe doctrine to the League of Nations. We do not refuse to submit questions which we may claim are controlled by that policy, but we refuse to submit the policy itself. By the Lodge or committee reservation, if a question arises as to the right of Japan to colonize in Mexico, we would say, "That comes under the Monroe doctrine, and we refuse to submit that question." That gets us somewhere; but under the amendment which is proposed the only thing that we reserve to ourselves is the blessed privilege that we will never submit to the League of Nations the policy of the Monroe doctrine. It seems to me that the only thing it covers and guards is the question whether or not we ought to have a Monroe doctrine. The amendment clearly is a most peculiar statement, as any Senator who will take it in his hands will see at a glance.

That the national policy of the United States, known as the Monroe doctrine, * * * is not in any way impaired or affected by the covenant and is not subject to any decision—

That is, the policy is not subject to any decision—by the council.

Instead of a question which has arisen to which the policy may apply being reserved, we reserve the policy itself. It seems to me that it—the amendment—is utterly without meaning. Now, I will not say that any Senator who has supported this proposition wants to surrender the rights of the United States, but it is a singular thing to me to find a great question like this, which it is admitted jeopardizes the sovereignty of our country, dealt with here in the Senate as though we ought to be very careful not exactly to save it, but that we ought to reserve just as little of the Monroe doctrine as possible.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the construction which the Senator from Missouri is placing upon the amendment, but I should like to ask the Senator's view of this question: Suppose we adopt the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts and leave article 11 just as it stands, does the Senator believe that in the practical workings of the league the reservation will ever amount to anything?

Mr. REED. I am very sure that if we ever set up this thing called the League of Nations and it asserts its authority over any question there is, after all, only one remedy for any nation, and that is to exercise its power to defend itself and to defy the jurisdiction of the league.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely. It would come to the very point where we now are in the Adriatic affair?

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. BORAH. Instead of saying that we will withdraw the treaty from the Senate we will say that we will withdraw from the league; that is the only remedy that we shall ever have.

Mr. REED. And we shall have to take two years to do that.

Mr. BORAH. We shall not only have to take two years to do it, but we shall have agreed in advance that every nation which is a member of the league has a perfect right to engage in conflict with us and to fight us while we are doing it and for doing it.

Mr. REED. Oh, certainly. Nevertheless, to state the question with all fairness, it may be possible if the Lodge reservation is adopted that it will have a restraining effect upon this body which we are about to create; but that it is not a real protection is, in my opinion, not open to dispute. It is not a real protection. In the last analysis, we are setting up a body without any constitution to govern it, without any court to construe or regulate its acts, and with no real guaranty of safety to any State of the world except the ability of the State to take care of itself.

Right on that point, Mr. President, is this not a good time to pause and give a few moments' thought to the tremendous importance of the recent letter of the President to the diplomats of Europe? Stated very briefly, this is the situation in which the President finds himself to-day by his own words: That if the Senate had ratified this treaty as he brought it to the Senate, and if he had exchanged ratifications, and if the League of Nations had been established, we would now be bound by that treaty and would be a member of the league; and yet the dispute over Fiume would have come up, would have been settled by the same men who have undertaken to settle it, and we would have been committed to the league, would have been in the league, and consequently powerless to defend ourselves as the President is now defending himself against what he considers a wrongful act.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. I wish merely to recall to the Senator the statement of Stephane Laussane, which is pertinent in this connection, that if the United States entered the league, if it intervened in European affairs, necessarily it must tolerate European intervention in American affairs.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The suggestion of the Senator from Illinois seems to me to reach the very crux of the controversy. We can not interfere in the controversies and differences between European nations and at the same time consistently deny their right to interfere in the affairs and controversies of the nations of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. McCORMICK. Their intervention here has begun, for, as the Senator will recall, the Spanish foreign office has transmitted to Washington the notice of the parties in the Spanish Cortes demanding our withdrawal from Santo Domingo.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that might have occurred independently of this treaty or of anything it contains, but we all, familiar with the contemporaneous history of the Monroe doctrine, remember that Mr. Jefferson's fundamental postulate was that we must not concern ourselves in cisatlantic affairs. Now, if we go into this league, and under its covenants we must necessarily take part in and assume the responsibility for the decision of European troubles, it makes no difference what sort of an amendment or reservation we adopt here; and we can not deny their right correspondingly to interfere in the affairs of the Western Hemisphere. Hence, while I shall vote for any reservation that seems to withdraw the Monroe doctrine from the jurisdiction of the league, I do not deceive myself with the notion that it will be at all effectual. We must be consistent, and, if we expect that the Monroe doctrine shall be preserved in all its integrity, we must observe the condition which makes that possible, and that is an abstention from the affairs of Europe, particularly from their difficulties and controversies. I am obliged to the Senator for yielding.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. To me it seems perfectly obvious, Mr. President, that we will be repeating the history of a hundred years ago. When the Holy Alliance was formed it was distinctly avowed that it would have nothing to do with the internal affairs of the component parts of the alliance; but the alliance had not been in existence for more than 12 or 15 years before the formula was created of jurisdiction and recognition over internal affairs that had external effect, and there is just exactly where we would land under the League of Nations.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the remarks which have been made by the Senators are very illuminating upon the points to which they have addressed themselves. I am speaking to another point for the moment; and I say that if there is any man in the world who ought to be glad to-day that the Senate has not ratified the treaty it is the President of the United States, because if we had ratified the treaty his arm would now be paralyzed and his power to compel European monarchs to withhold their action with reference to Fiume would be gone.

Let us follow that for a moment and let us see whether, in order really to sustain the President, it is not our duty at this juncture to refuse to ratify this treaty. The President has said to the European Governments in substance and effect: "In the settlement of this Fiume controversy you are following the old, selfish, autocratic methods of the past; you are disregarding the enlightened principles to which I have called your attention, and unless those enlightened principles can be in good faith adopted as the ruling policy in all international affairs, then the United States must not and will not enter this league; and, therefore, unless you will abandon the position you have taken with reference to Fiume I shall be obliged to consider withdrawing entirely from the League of Nations." He can say that to-day with great force, and the British and French statesmen respond that they "are thrown into a state of consternation" by the mere threat of a possible withdrawal of this document from the Senate.

That is his great lever; that is his great power; and yet friends of the President, particular advocates of the President, champions of the President, propose to deprive him of that power by rushing this treaty to ratification and consummation at the very time the President's only weapon is a threat to withdraw it!

If I pretended to be a champion of the White House and to get my inspiration by turning my face toward the White House each morning, lifting my eyes in supplication for light, I would be on this floor insisting that when the President is engaged in this great international controversy the Senate should sustain his hands by refusing to consider this treaty further until the European powers had yielded to the President's will. It is the only possible position for men to take. Behold the anomaly! Here is the President, engaged in a great struggle. He has but one weapon—that is the threat to withdraw the treaty. Here are the advocates and champions of the President trying to tear that weapon from his hands while that controversy is pending!

If you do that, then the prime ministers of England and of France can laugh in the President's face. They can say to him: "You can not withdraw your treaty, Mr. President. You are in this league, and you are here for two years. Now, we will deal with the question of Fiume and Jugo-Slavia as we see fit, not as members of the league, but as the representatives of great powers dealing with this question."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator surely does not mean to imply that if in a certain event they may laugh in the President's face, they are at this moment laughing behind his back?

Mr. REED. The Senator from Illinois possesses an exquisite satire which I frequently envy him, but I am dealing with this question in the most serious manner.

Mr. McCORMICK. So is the President.

Mr. REED. Yes; but so are not some of the particular champions of the President.

Why, Mr. President, to adopt a simile, the question is exactly like the illustration I will use. Here are two armies, drawn up in battle array. The commander of one of those armies has a battery with which he can destroy the enemy. Negotiations have been pending looking to the making of peace, but a controversy arises which the commander of the army having the battery regards as vital, and he thereupon states to the enemy: "Unless you accede to my terms, I will open on you with my battery." While that threat is pending, his own men, behind his back, turn the battery over to the enemy, and yet claim to be his loyal supporters! I can not understand that sort of service.

I have been classed here as a critic of the President. I have not been a critic of the man personally. I have not agreed with certain public questions he has submitted, and I do not agree to this question, because I believe that just as we would find to-day, if we were in the League of Nations and tied by its provisions, that we would be helpless in the Fiume controversy, so in the future, in all the great disputes that may arise, we will find ourselves equally bound and equally helpless. Nevertheless, since the President of the United States has taken this position with reference to Fiume, since he has thrown the glove squarely in the face of the diplomats of Europe, since he has said to them, "Unless you yield to this question I will withdraw the treaty," I do not propose to be a party to disarming the President in the very hour of his contest. I do not propose to take away from him his only weapon. I do not propose to side with Great Britain and side with France against the President of the United States in the pending controversy.

You might as well treat the matter seriously. The point may have escaped some of my colleagues. But suppose you were an Englishman sitting over in the House of Commons, a real Englishman, and you witnessed the spectacle of the President of the United States saying, "Unless the Prime Minister of Great Britain backs down on the Fiume question, there shall be no League of Nations; I will withdraw the treaty," and then you beheld the American Senate rushing the treaty through to confirmation at the very time the President was making that threat: Would you not believe that the American Senate had cut the ground from under the President, and would you not laugh at him?

Suppose we put the shoe on the other foot; that it is not the President that is threatening to withdraw, but that the prime minister of England has threatened us that unless we yield on the Fiume question Great Britain will cancel its signature to the treaty. Suppose that the Parliament of Great Britain were to meet and pass a law providing that the prime minister could not take that action, would we not all understand that the prime minister was whipped, and whipped by his own men, conquered by his own forces, destroyed by his own nation? Manifestly that is the situation.

Now, sir, let us see. Is this important or is it unimportant?

I read from the President's letter. There are several references. Perhaps I may read a number of them.

In his note of February 10 the President said:

> The President is glad to feel that the associates of this Government would not consent to embarrass it by placing it in the necessity of refusing adhesion to a settlement which in form would be an agreement by both parties to the controversy, but which in fact would not have that great merit if one party was forced to submit to material injustice by threats of still greater calamities in default of submission.

Then he proceeds to discuss the inequalities of this treaty, and states:

> These and other provisions of the memorandum of January 14, negotiated without the knowledge or approval of the American Government, change the whole face of the Adriatic settlement, and in the eyes of this Government render it unworkable and rob it of that measure of justice which is essential if this Government is to cooperate in maintaining its terms.

That is all I care to read at that point. Notice how emphatic he is:

> These and other provisions of the memorandum of January 14, negotiated without the knowledge or approval of the American Government, change the whole face of the Adriatic settlement, and in the eyes of this Government render it unworkable and rob it of that measure of justice which is essential if this Government is to cooperate in maintaining its terms.

Mr. President, I am going to decline to speak to empty benches. Everybody has gone to luncheon. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it. The noes have it.

Mr. SHEPPARD and Mr. THOMAS called for a division.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. McCORMICK. Less than a quorum can adjourn. Did the Chair decide the vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decided the vote. The Chair declared that "the noes seem to have it; the noes have it."

Mr. SHEPPARD. And I asked for a division.

Mr. REED. Very well, Mr. President; I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Frelinghuysen	Knox	Ransdell

Borah	Glass	Lodge	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Missouri proceeds with the very interesting discussion in which he was indulging, I wish, if it would not interrupt him, to ask him a question, if he will yield for that purpose.

Mr. REED. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator was discussing the ultimatum which the President had delivered to the European negotiators with whom he was in correspondence in relation to this dispute. I will have to make a short statement in order to lay the foundation for the question. It is this:

As I understand it, the parties between whom the dispute as to Fiume exists, to wit, Italy and Jugo-Slavia, are both members of the league. As such they have delegates in the assembly of the league, to which any case may be removed from the council at the request of either party. Under article 11 of the treaty, which they have ratified, it is the duty of the council and of the assembly also to consider any matter that threatens the peace of the world. This matter certainly does that. Why does not the league, the very purpose of the existence of which is to maintain peace and prevent an outbreak, take jurisdiction of this thing? Why is it left for our President, we not being a member of the league, to decide the terms upon which the dispute will be settled, if it shall be settled, and to oust the league from the very jurisdiction that is conferred upon it and which was the sole purpose of its existence?

Mr. REED. The Senator comes from a State that is generally called a Yankee State. So he will permit me to adopt the Yankee policy of answering by asking him a question. In view of the fact that the controversies of Europe are not yet settled and the United States is assumed to have an interest in their settlement, does the Senator know why our representatives were several weeks ago entirely withdrawn from Europe?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator comes from a State that has to be shown [laughter], and he belongs to the party that is in custody of the information he is asking; but neither the White House nor the State Department gives us any information upon these things. I shall have to refer him to his friends at that end of the Avenue.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does the Senator mean Mr. Colby?

Mr. REED. I asked the question because it seems to me to lie at the root of the answer to the question of the Senator from Connecticut. I have never understood the situation. We were engaged in a war in Europe. Peace had not yet formally been declared. A peace had been negotiated with Germany and signed by Germany and signed by a number of the other powers and had been sent to us for ratification. That peace treaty contains the terms of the League of Nations covenant. It was declared that when a certain number of nations had signed the covenant of the League of Nations the treaty should become effective, so that the league would come into effect upon those signatures having been attached. Thereupon, although the controversy existed between Jugo-Slavia and Italy and although numerous controversies still remained unsettled, our representatives were entirely withdrawn not only from the peace conference but from Europe, and we were left without any representative there.

Then this situation appears to have developed. The League of Nations is in existence; it is functioning; and also the peace conference is still going on in our absence. If we withdrew from the peace conference it would seem that we ought not to complain of what was there done after our withdrawal. If we intended to interfere in what was done by the peace conference, it would appear that we ought to have kept our representative there to have spoken for us. If, however, we withdrew because the League of Nations was functioning, expecting the League of Nations to handle this question, then it would appear that the protest now being made ought to be that the wrong tribunal is deciding it, and that the question ought to be sent over to the League of Nations.

I do not know of any better way to answer the Senator than that, and that is not satisfactory to me, because the whole situation is, to my mind, a maze through which no mind can see the path of reason. Indeed, I think there is no reason running through the situation.

But, Mr. President, I want to come back to the proposition which I was making to the Senate, that when the President of the United States had said to the European powers, "Unless you do what I regard as justice in the Fiume case I will withdraw the treaty from the Senate," it seems to me to be an assault from the rear, the indulgence of bushwhacking tactics, for the Senate to deprive him of the power he now seeks to exercise, by confirming the treaty, thus taking away his weapon. I say that in all the good faith in the world. The inevitable effect upon the European mind will be, if we were to aprove the treaty to-day, to convince it that we have said to the President, "You can not now withdraw the treaty because it is approved and affirmed." We withdraw our support in the very hour of controversy and trial.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Even if the Senate ratified the treaty, would not the President still be in possession of his weapon? He would have the treaty there in his pocket in the White House, and he could decline to file the instrument of ratification until they surrendered to him, could he not?

Mr. BORAH. I think we ought not to take that chance.

Mr. REED. I doubt that. It is true the President has done that sort of thing with minor treaties, but it is my opinion, as a matter of proper construction of the Constitution, that when the President negotiates an instrument and lays it before this body, up to the time this body has acted he can withdraw it, but when the body by a two-thirds vote has ratified, advised, and consented to that treaty, the point of finality has been reached. Life has been breathed into the treaty by the action of the Senate. The manual delivery of the document has nothing whatever to do with its validity.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Missouri is at it again, resurrecting the Constitution of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. We had a reference to it by the President of the United States a few days ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCORMICK. Inadvertently.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I think not. The Constitution is always a great thing. I am not prepared to say that the President has meant to disregard the Constitution of the United States. He has appealed to it several times lately. But I do not hold to the doctrine that after this last act that the Government of the United States has to do with the treaty has been performed by the Senate, any man can nullify the action of the Senate by withholding the delivery of the document.

Mr. KING and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I think I ought to yield to the Senator from Connecticut, as he rose first.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When the Senator made a similar statement, a minute ago, I wanted to ask him if he did not think this would make a difference. If the Senate by a two-thirds vote had ratified the treaty in the exact form in which the President submitted it to us, I agree with him that that would conclude the transaction; but if the Senate ratifies the treaty with reservations which change the aspect of this country to the treaty, does the Senator then think that the President would not have a right to withhold the treaty?

Mr. REED. That is a different question, and one I would not want to pass upon without more than a passing moment's consideration. The position from which I was discussing the question is that of the friends and supporters of the President, the position of that assemblage of distinguished Senators who have looked to the White House for their inspiration on the treaty, and who stand ready to do what the White House desires. The White House has demanded the adoption of the treaty without a single change. Therefore that is the position I assume for the present.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. From that standpoint I say it is absolutely illogical, and it is unkind and cruel to seek to take from the President the only weapon he has at the very hour when the controversy is hottest. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was wondering why the Senator did not equally denounce the Senators upon the other side, who seem so wedded to the Lodge reservations that they will not consent to a change of any of them, even in a matter of form, and whether the Senator has inquired as to the source from which their inspiration comes.

Mr. REED. That is entirely aside the question I am discussing. When the time comes to discuss the Lodge reservations I will tell you what I think about them; I shall have some very plain words to speak. I am supporting the Lodge reservations because if my country is going to be pushed into a furnace I desire that it shall be burned as little as possible. If we are to be pushed into a condition where we may be destroyed, I want to go as short a distance as possible. I do not pretend to claim that the Lodge reservations cure the defects of the treaty, and that is the reason why I am against the treaty with the Lodge reservations.

But I do not desire to be led aside from the theme I am discussing. I say to the men in the Senate on both sides, when our President is engaged in this sort of a controversy with the diplomats of Europe, and when he has said to them, "Unless you yield I will withdraw the treaty from the Senate and I will refuse to enter the League of Nations," with that question pending for the Senate to approve the treaty and thus disarm him is to fire upon the President of the United States from the rear. There is not a particle of doubt if we had a little different atmosphere here and this question were presented under normal conditions, we would find the Senate standing as a solid body and demanding that no action should be taken, thus certifying to the powers of Europe that the American Government was at one and a unit with the Chief Magistrate.

But I started to read what the President had to say about the importance of this question. Let us see as a preliminary what the President said in some of his speeches. How grave the situation in Europe in his opinion must be to lead him to the declaration he has recently made. In one of his speeches to the country, when he was opposing all kinds of reservations, he said:

> This—
> The league—
> is the only conceivable system that you can substitute for the older order of things which brought the calamity of this war upon us and would assuredly bring the calamity of another war upon us. Your choice is between the League of Nations and Germanism.

At other places he has said, in substance, that civilization is at stake, that the very race and its destiny is at stake, but I content myself with the one literal quotation. Let me read it again:

> Your choice is between the League of Nations and Germanism.

And yet, sir, when the Fiume controversy is presented he tells us that the settlement of it in the way he demands is so important that he will be warranted in withdrawing the treaty, leaving the world to the old order of affairs, thus turning the world over to Germanism.

Mr. McCORMICK. To association with the contemptible quitters.

Mr. REED. Yes. Let me read from his letter of the 10th of February—last month:

It is time to speak with the utmost frankness. The Adriatic issue as it now presents itself raises the fundamental question as to whether the American Government can on any terms cooperate with its European associates in the great work of maintaining the peace of the world by removing the primary causes of war.

Do you get the awful significance of those words?

The Adriatic question as it now presents itself raises the fundamental question as to whether the American Government can on any terms cooperate with its European associates in the great work of maintaining the peace of the world by removing the primary causes of war.

That is to say, their conduct has been so execrable and their spirit so at war with the new spirit that was to control the world, their motives are so diabolic, and their evil purpose so clear that it is now a grave question whether we can afford—I quote his language—"to cooperate with them in the great work of maintaining the peace of the world," although according to the previous statement which I have read a failure to so cooperate leaves the world to the fate of Germanism.

I continue reading:

This Government does not doubt its ability to reach amicable understandings with the associated governments as to what constitutes equity and justice in international dealings, for differences of opinion as to the best methods of applying just principles have never obscured the vital fact that in the main the several governments have entertained the same fundamental conception of what those principles are.

That is, they can agree on a principle of equity. But now to the practical application. I read further:

But if substantial agreement on what is just and reasonable is not to determine international issues, if the country possessing the most endurance in pressing its demands rather than the country armed with a just cause is to gain the support of the powers, if forcible seizure of coveted areas is to be permitted and condoned and is to receive ultimate justification by creating a situation so difficult that decision favorable to the aggressor is deemed a practical necessity; if deliberately incited ambition is, under the name of national sentiment, to be rewarded at the expense of the small and the weak; if, in a word, the old order of things which brought so many evils on the world is still to prevail, then the time is not yet come when this Government can enter a concert of powers the very existence of which must depend upon a new spirit and a new order. The American people are willing to share in such high enterprise, but many among them are fearful unless they become entangled in international policies and committed to international obligations foreign alike to their ideals and their traditions. To commit them to such a policy as that embodied in the latest Adriatic proposals and to obligate them to maintain injustice as against the claims of justice would be to provide the most solid ground for such fears. This Government can undertake no such grave responsibility.

The President desires to say that if it does not appear feasible to secure acceptance of the just and generous concessions offered by the British, French, and American Governments to Italy in the joint memorandum of those powers of December 9, 1919, which the President has already clearly stated to be the maximum concession that the Government of the United States can offer, the President desires to say that he must take under serious consideration the withdrawal of the treaty with Germany and the agreement between the United States and France of June 28, 1919, which are now before the Senate.

That is to say, because of the misconduct of these powers, because they are "wedded to the old order," because they are guilty of a great act of international injustice, the President tells them that unless they recede he must "take under consideration the withdrawal" of this treaty and also of the treaty of defense which France asked us to sign with her, and that the world is to be, in consequence, thrown back into what the President has described as the "old conditions" where, as he stated, war will be inevitable and Germanism certain to become the fate of the world.

Mr. President, with that threat made and the situation thus outlined, the pretended champions of the President still ask to have this treaty ratified and ratified without a single change, so that when the ratification takes place it will be an effective instrument, finally concluded and binding upon the United States.

I appeal to your judgment, to your fairness. Suppose this question as it now arises were dissociated from this long controversy and that a matter had arisen of this gravity between England and France and Italy upon the one side and Jugo-Slavia upon the other, that the United States were a third party, and our President had said what he has here said, would not the Senate of the United States immediately respond by saying, "We will withhold action upon this instrument until the President has the opportunity to determine the question, either to gain his point or, if he does not gain his point, be at full liberty of action to carry out his threat"? Is that not absolutely the situation? Is it not the duty of every champion of the President, aye, is it not the duty of every Senator here under this strange condition of international affairs—a very grave one, indeed—to take the position that the Senate will withhold action upon this treaty until the President has a chance to play this international game to a finish, thus indicating to all the world by our acts that we propose in international affairs to present a solid and unbroken front? I say there would not be a doubt under normal conditions what our action would be. Suppose this afternoon we ratify the treaty, what becomes of the President's threat? What becomes of his controversy? Have we not, to use the expression I employed a moment ago, cut the ground from under him?

Is this controversy over there a small or trivial thing? There is not a Senator in this Chamber who would have been for this League of Nations if it had not been presented here by the President. A Senator might have been for some kind of a League of Nations, but he would not have been for this one. The President has told you how important it is; he has stated that the peace of the world depends upon it; that the future of mankind hangs upon it; and that to reject it means to plunge the world into Germanism. All this he has told you time and time again, and yet he declares this Fiume controversy to be so crucial, to be so fundamental, to be so overmastering in its importance that if it is decided wrong it will be a greater calamity than the defeat of the League of Nations, with all of the evils that he has told us will flow in the wake of that defeat. Yet we do not hesitate at the very hour of the crisis of the battle to go right along undertaking to approve a document which he fears he may find it necessary to withdraw. I should like to have some one point to an escape from that.

I desire to read a little further what the President had to say about the Fiume controversy, or rather let me for the moment read what the British and French statesmen had to say in their reply:

They are reluctant to believe that the President can consider that the modifications which they have made in the memorandum of December 9 can constitute in themselves a justification for a withdrawal from all further cooperation with them in the attempt to adjust peaceably the world's affairs.

A little later they say:

The Governments of France and Great Britain, therefore, view with consternation the threat of the United States Government to withdraw from the comity of nations because it does not agree with the precise terms of the Adriatic settlement. The difficulty of reconciling ethnographic with other considerations is certainly not greater in the Adriatic case and does not produce more anomalous results than in the case of other parts of the general treaties of peace difficulties which were recognized by President Wilson and his colleagues where they agreed to the best settlement practicable at the time because their machinery for peaceful readjustment had come into being; also ethnologic reasons can not be the only ones to be taken into account is clearly shown by the inclusion of 3,000,000 Germans in Czechoslovakia, and the proposals so actively supported by the United States delegation for the inclusion within Poland of great Ruthenian majorities, exceeding 3,500,000 in number, to Polish rule. Though the British representatives saw serious objections to this arrangement, the British Government have not thought themselves justified in reconsidering on that account their membership in the League of Nations. The Governments of France and Great Britain, therefore, earnestly trust that whatever the final view of the United States Government as to the Adriatic settlement may be, they will not wreck the whole machinery for dealing with international disputes by withdrawing from the treaties of 1919 because their view is not adopted in this particular case.

Now, see what they declare will be the fate of the world—

That would be to destroy the hopes now entertained by countless millions of people all over the world that the most enduring and most beneficent part of the treaty of peace was the constitution of machinery whereby the defects of treaties could be remedied, and that changing conditions and requirements of mankind could be adjusted by processes of reason and justice instead of by the balancing of armaments and resort to war. The Governments of France and Great Britain can not believe that it is the purpose of the American people to take a step so far-reaching and terrible in its effects on a ground which has the appearance of being so inadequate.

So that the Governments of Great Britain and of France treat the withdrawal as the President treats it, as a great world catastrophe; but nevertheless the President adheres to his position. I read from his last letter:

The President asks that the prime ministers of France, Great Britain, and Italy will read his determination in the Adriatic matters in the light of these principles and settlements and will realize that standing upon such a foundation of principle he must of necessity maintain the position which he arrived at after months of earnest consideration. He confidently counts upon their cooperation in this effort on his part to maintain for the allied and associated powers that direction of affairs which was initiated by the victory over Germany and the peace conference at Paris.

In the whole of his last letter—and I have only read a portion of it—the President takes emphatically the position that he stands upon his previous letter and refuses to recede from it by an inch. That was an absolute ultimatum to these governments to yield or he would withdraw the treaty. Now, at the time that controversy is keenest we propose to ratify the treaty and take away from him the power of withdrawing it.

Mr. President, it would more comport with friendly action toward the President if some of our friends who have gone there alone for their inspiration and their ideas were to introduce a resolution that the Senate stands back of the President and will defer action on the treaty until Italy, France, and England have yielded to his demands. But instead of that we make haste to pass it, and in order to pass it numerous Senators are engaged in the business of trying to sugar-coat each reservation so that when it goes down we will not taste it, and after it has gone down it will not operate. [Laughter.] Let some of the ardent advocates of this treaty without reservations or amendments or changes tell us what position the President will be in to-morrow morning if we ratify this treaty without an amendment, and thus take from him forever the power of withdrawing it.

Incidentally there has been something said by the President about coercion; that is to say that Jugo-Slavia had submitted to it the proposition either to accept the terms laid down or to accept the terms of the treaty of London. The President complains that that is not the way to arrive at a just decision.

The soul of his utterances is that every decision ought to be rendered without compulsion and without coercion of any kind, that it should be settled upon its merits and in accordance with the principles of equity as construed in the high court of justice and reason. But behold the alternative he places before the Governments of Great Britain, of France, and of Italy! First, he tells them if we do not have the League of Nations the world will come to wrack and ruin; war's devastating flame will sweep every quarter of the earth; Germanism will place its cloven foot upon the bosom of liberty; and the sword of war will be pressed to the beating hearts of all men and women living; and then he tells them, "Unless England and France and Italy yield to me on the Fiume question that shall be the fate of the world," for, says the President, "I will withdraw from the league, and there can then be no league." Second, he says to France, "I agree that, in addition to the League of Nations' protection, you ought to have for some years of time an absolute guaranty of the assistance of Great Britain and of America in case you are unjustly attacked by Germany. Therefore I propose to recommend to the Senate, and do recommend, that it shall pledge the last drop of the blood of our boys and the last dollar of our treasure to defend you against unjust attack by Germany."

Although he has said all that, he now says to France: "Yield on the Jugo-Slavia question or I will withdraw that treaty, and you will be open to unjust attack by Germany; your fields can be invaded, your cities destroyed, your women murdered, and the beast of war shall devour your substance and your children." This is the alternative he presents to them; and in the high court of reason and justice, where only equity is to decide and coercion is not to be employed, these are the clubs that are placed beside the seat of justice, these are the swords suspended above the heads of the litigants!

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Was it not in reliance upon the promise of the President to advocate the ratification by the Senate of the Franco-American treaty of alliance that France withdrew her claim for the German Rhineland?

Mr. REED. I understand that to be the case.

So, Mr. President, conceding, as we must all concede, that the President is sincere, that he has been sincere in all he has said, and endeavoring to coordinate these various views, there is but one deduction possible, namely, that the Fiume controversy is of such a fundamental character, is so grave in its nature, and so far-reaching in its results, that its proper settlement outweighs all the calamities, all the fears, all the wars, all the devastations that the President has told us will occur if the League of Nations is not adopted. If such is his opinion, then let those who have gone to his opinions for their opinions, who have, like satellites, shone alone in the reflected glory of the great central luminary, who have attained their heat, their power, and their political prestige from that one sovereign and sacred source, answer me why they are trying now to disarm him. Why do they not bring here a resolution certifying to Lloyd-George and to the prime ministers of Italy and of France that the American Senate is standing by the President; that the Senate will not breathe the breath of life into this treaty until foreign Governments have yielded, and that the Senate is holding the treaty in a position where he can withdraw it at any moment if his wishes are not complied with?

Mr. President, I could take the time of the Senate for hours in reading from this volume of the President's speeches, in which he has depicted the horrors that will come to the world if we do not have a League of Nations, but I shall not further trespass upon your time. I shall view with curiosity the attitude of those men who so desire to save the world that they are willing to enter into a contract surrendering the sovereignty of America but are unwilling to remain out of a contract when a great international injustice is to be done, and when, by remaining out, they can sustain the hands of the President in the controversy he now has with three great world powers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, to reservation No. 5.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am going to ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the pending amendment. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gay	Knox	Pittman
Ball	Gerry	Lenroot	Ransdell
Beckham	Glass	Lodge	Reed
Borah	Gore	McCormick	Sheppard
Brandegee	Gronna	McKellar	Shields
Calder	Hale	McLean	Simmons
Capper	Harris	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Henderson	Moses	Smith, Md.
Colt	Hitchcock	Myers	Smoot
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Spencer
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	New	Sterling
Curtis	Kellogg	Norris	Sutherland
Dial	Kendrick	Nugent	Thomas
Dillingham	Kenyon	Overman	Townsend
Elkins	Keyes	Owen	Trammell
Fletcher	King	Page	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Phipps	Wolcott

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I call for the yeas and nays upon the substitute, and before the roll is called I ask to have the substitute stated.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, before the yeas and nays are had upon this substitute, which purposes to withdraw from the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States the determination of the Monroe doctrine, I wish to submit to the Senate the remarks of Lord Robert Cecil bearing upon the subject:

The amendment respecting the Monroe doctrine—does not specifically recognize what is commonly understood to be the American conception of that feature of American foreign policy; but the amendment was frankly accepted in order that the occasion for certain opposition to the league covenant in America might be removed. The amendment may be described as vague in its essence. It leaves the Monroe doctrine where 50 years or so of international practice has left it, and one gathers that it is regarded as fully satisfying American susceptibilities about the cardinal features of their international policy. If any dispute should arise about the Monroe doctrine, the council of the league is there to settle it.

It is entirely consistent with the purposes of those who have fought to bestow upon another power six times our vote that they should seek, by every device, to destroy the Monroe doctrine. They are to be praised for their consistency. They are determined that we shall depart from the policies which have guided the conduct of our foreign affairs from the beginning of the Republic until this time. They are candid in their purpose. They will leave nothing undone to make an end to those policies.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I thought that the view of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] regarding the language of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was very well taken. The substitute of the Senator from Nebraska simply debars the submission by us of the national policy known as the Monroe doctrine, but would not prevent the league from taking jurisdiction of specific cases which were claimed to be a violation of that policy. I think myself that the reservation reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations and adopted by the Senate previously upon this question could be improved. It is equivalent to saying that we do not submit questions under the Monroe doctrine to the league. I think it might have been better to say that the league should have no jurisdiction whatever over any question that we considered to involve or affect the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator, I think, has forgotten the language.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I may have done so.

Mr. LODGE. The reservation says that it is "hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The question of the Monroe doctrine?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. It reads:

Said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That certainly covers it. Any question concerning the Monroe doctrine ought to be outside the jurisdiction of the league. Those who believe in America interpreting its own policy can not assert those policies too strongly. Any suggestion that we ought to allow any other country to interpret a purely North American policy is utterly abhorrent to me. It is inconsistent with sovereignty, and that is all there is to it. Nobody would say that our tariff policy, which is our own business, ought not to be interpreted and decided exclusively by us. It would be an impertinence in my mind to allow anybody else to have anything to say about it.

The Monroe doctrine is a mere assertion by us for our defense, and practically it was that we would regard it as an unfriendly act if any European power or foreign power endeavored to set up their institutions upon this continent. That is our statement. It ought to be exclusively interpreted by us. I am not afraid of offending anybody by saying that we insist upon the right to interpret our own declarations. If I had any sensitiveness about it, I should have been equally sensitive about originally making the declaration, which was certainly at that time out of a clear sky, and much more of a surprise and affront, if they chose to consider it so, to other nations than it is to say after we have asserted and maintained it successfully for over half a century that we still insist upon our interpretation of it, especially inasmuch as the Senate has already adopted in the Lodge reservation the statement that we do insist upon our own right to exclusively interpret our own policy.

What would be the effect of now striking it out after this debate? It could not be considered by any other power in the world in any other light except as a withdrawal from the position previously taken by the Senate and an assertion in lieu of our previous position that other powers or the league were invited to help us interpret the Monroe doctrine. That is of such an offensive nature to me that I can not conceive that any American would want to vote for such a declaration as that.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not the evident purpose of those on the other side to leave the Monroe doctrine a cause for dispute and a cause for future war, if it is taken out of the jurisdiction of the league, and that they desire to leave it as a matter of dispute for the future.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I can not state what the purpose of the other side is or of any Senator who offers something designed to modify the reservations hitherto adopted by the Senate. The effect of it, of course, I can see, and the clear implication of the language used. My judgment is that nobody in favor of a ratification of the treaty would consciously want to surrender essential and vital American rights, rights that pertain to our sovereignty. It is my own inclination to believe that a good many of the so-called substitutes and modifications which are now being offered are simply to lure those who have voted for the reservations hitherto adopted into getting into such a mood of changing their own work and rewriting and shaving and whittling it down as that ultimately they will change the vitals of things.

I regard the present substitute tendered by the Senator from Nebraska as a direct drive at one of the vitals of America—the Monroe doctrine. There are others that have been and will be offered, some of which I think, perhaps, could originally have been adopted by the Senate without very much damage, but it is a mere attempt now to modify the Lodge reservations for the purpose of modifying them, not for the purpose of improving them or of protecting the country, but for the purpose in some way of fixing it so that it can not be said that the Lodge reservations remained intact.

But, irrespective of any sparring for position or any skillful rapier play about inconsequential things, there is, in my opinion, no question that the Lodge reservation on the Monroe doctrine is absolutely vital, and I do not think it can be stated in better language than it is now formed in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the provision under consideration differs radically from the one which we had under consideration a short time ago and upon which we acted this morning. There was a definite declaration in the league covenant which gave to the council the right to determine what were our domestic problems and no interpretation could be effective. It was essential that by reservation we should change the provision of the covenant. The reason why I am willing to vote for an interpretation in this case is that I think the league covenant meant to exempt the Monroe doctrine, but it did it in a bungling way. I will read the provision of the covenant, article 21:

> Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine for securing the maintenance of peace.

I suppose that means that nothing in the league covenant is to take the Monroe doctrine under its provisions, but I am surprised that any student of American history should call the Monroe doctrine a regional understanding for securing the maintenance of peace. It is neither; and yet I have felt that we could afford to say that we understand it to mean that the Monroe doctrine is not to be interfered with by the League of Nations, and is not carried into the consideration either of the council or the assembly.

The objection I had to the reservation was to the language "is to be interpreted by the United States alone." I want to say distinctly that in objecting to that language I do not mean at all to concede that anyone shall interpret it for us. I believe when occasion arises we should apply the doctrine, decide what it is, and interpret it for ourselves.

I had the privilege for nearly two years of hearing the Monroe doctrine discussed by Judge Gresham, Mr. Olney, and Mr. Carlisle, three of the greatest minds I ever met, and I remember well the declaration which came from Mr. Cleveland announcing the doctrine in no uncertain terms. I recall also the morning when he presented to the Cabinet his celebrated Venezuelan message, and some were frightened; but he advised that it had already been sent to Congress, and he referred to it as his "peace measure" and the only way to prevent a breach between the United States and Great Britain.

If I thought leaving those words out would mean that we did intend to permit any other nation or any organized body to interpret for us the Monroe doctrine, I would be in favor of leaving the reservation unchanged. I expect if they are not left out, if the substitute of the Senator from Nebraska is not adopted, to follow the course I have been following and seek to make reservations as nearly as possible what I think they ought to be and then vote for what has been approved by the majority of the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, and I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment to the substitute will be reported.

The READING CLERK. Strike out all after the word "nations" in line 7 of the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, and insert:

> And no question which in the judgment of the United States depends upon or relates to such doctrine shall be subject to any inquiry, report, or decision by the council or assembly.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should like to have it read now as it would read with the suggested amendment agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

> 5. That the national policy of the United States known as the Monroe doctrine, as announced and interpreted by the United States, is not in any way impaired or affected by the covenant of the League of Nations, and no question which in the judgment of the United States depends upon or relates to such doctrine shall be subject to any inquiry, report, or decision by the council or assembly.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the reason why I have offered the amendment is obvious. Without the amendment the question might arise as to whether the council or the assembly of the League of Nations were to consider a question that they believed was not within our reservation or whether it would be left to the judgment of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not inclined to agree with the Senator that such a situation would be possible, but I have no objection to the change which the Senator suggests and I accept it as a part of my substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska accepts the modification offered by the Senator from Nevada. The question is upon agreeing to the substitute as modified.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Can the Senator tell us how it differs now in any material degree from the Lodge reservation?

Mr. PITTMAN. In that it does not voluntarily use language which might be considered obnoxious by some of our friendly nations. I think that some have placed obnoxious language in these reservations for the deliberate purpose of preventing their acceptance by other nations.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What obnoxious language is proposed to be omitted?

Mr. PITTMAN. The amendment, as I propose it, allows the United States to withhold any question that it considers relates to or depends upon the Monroe doctrine. The Senators upon the other side who are intent upon defeating the treaty and who have drawn these reservations have gone just as far as this proposed reservation now goes, but not satisfied with that they have voluntarily thrown in language which carries the import, as I said——

Mr. TOWNSEND. What language is that?

Mr. PITTMAN. The language is that the United States shall be the sole judge of this question. The United States becomes the sole judge under the reservation as I have proposed it. There is not, in my opinion, any difference in the purport or the effect of it at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is what the Senator wanted to know. We very frequently have a way of discussing matters and making statements that accomplish the same purpose without making the language insulting.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then the Senator agrees with the real intent of the reservation to protect the Monroe doctrine?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly. I do not see how any other opinion could be held.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The only objection the Senator now has is that the language of the Lodge reservation is not what the Senator thinks it ought to be?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have stated my objection to the language. I think that the language used might prevent some country from accepting it. I am anxious that any reservations we adopt shall be accepted, because, in my opinion, if they are not accepted then we are not in the League of Nations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] as modified.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have hitherto announced my pair. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent owing to illness. By a transfer he is paired on this vote with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the negative). I failed to announce my pair on this vote. I have a pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], which I transfer to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is ill and unable to attend the sessions of the Senate, to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]; and

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Beckham	Henderson	Nugent	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Overman	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Trammell

Harris	Myers	Simmons

NAYS—43.

Ball	Fernald	McCormick	Sherman
Borah	Frelinghuysen	McLean	Shields
Brandegee	Gronna	McNary	Smoot

Cummins	Kenyon	Norris	Townsend
Curtis	Keyes	Page	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Knox	Phipps	Warren

NOT VOTING—18.

Ashurst	Harrison	Penrose	Thomas
Fall	Johnson, Calif.	Robinson	Underwood
France	La Follette	Smith, Ariz.	Walsh, Mass.
Gore	McCumber	Stanley
Harding	Newberry	Swanson

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment in the nature of a substitute to reservation No. 5 was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon reservation No. 5.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am informed that if my pair, the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], were present, he would vote in the affirmative upon this reservation. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with whom I have a general pair, is absent on account of sickness and can not be present. I transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent. If present, he would vote "yea." On this vote he stands paired, by transfer, with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. If present, on this question he would vote "yea." I have also been requested to announce the absence of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on official business. If present, the Senator from New Mexico would vote "yea" on this reservation.

I have also been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The result was announced—yeas 58, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—58.

Ball	Frelinghuysen	McLean	Sherman
Beckham	Gore	McNary	Shields
Borah	Gronna	Moses	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Hale	Myers	Smoot
Calder	Henderson	Nelson	Spencer
Capper	Jones, Wash.	New	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Norris	Sutherland
Colt	Kenyon	Nugent	Thomas
Cummins	Keyes	Owen	Townsend
Curtis	King	Page	Trammell
Dillingham	Kirby	Phelan	Wadsworth
Edge	Knox	Phipps	Warren
Elkins	Lenroot	Pittman	Watson
Fernald	Lodge	Poindexter
Fletcher	McCormick	Reed

NAYS—22.

Culberson	Harrison	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Dial	Hitchcock	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Gay	Johnson, S. Dak.	Ransdell	Williams
Gerry	Jones, N. Mex.	Sheppard	Wolcott

NOT VOTING—15.

Ashurst	Johnson, Calif.	Penrose	Swanson
Fall	La Follette	Robinson	Underwood
France	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.	Walsh, Mass.
Harding	Newberry	Stanley

So reservation No. 5 was agreed to, as follows:

5. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the League of Nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone, and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent, as in legislative session, for the consideration of the report I am about to present from the conference committee on the deficiency appropriation bill. It embraces only three items which were in dispute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the conference report which he is about to submit.

Mr. WARREN. I send the conference report to the desk and move its adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12046) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 17 and 34.

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22 with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed insert the following:

"To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out at once the provisions of paragraphs A and B of section 7 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines,' approved March 3, 1919, the limit of cost of the acquisition of the site and uncompleted building and the completion of the construction of hospital buildings in Cook County, Ill., authorized by said act, is hereby increased from $3,000,000 to $3,400,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into contracts therefor within the total limit of cost hereby fixed: Provided, That no part of said sum so authorized shall be used to pay any profit to either the owners of the land and present uncompleted building, Edward Hines and the Shank Co., or to the contractor for the completion of the work."

And the House agree to the same.

F. E. WARREN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
O. W. UNDERWOOD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JAMES W. GOOD,
J. G. CANNON,
JAMES F. BYRNES,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator in charge of the conference report whether the conferees have receded from the $3,000,000 item for the repair of ships of the Navy inserted by the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. They have been compelled to do so after struggling for two days, in addition to the efforts they made previous to the time when the first report was submitted. In the meantime the matter had been submitted to the House, debated there, and had been defeated by a majority of more than 2 to 1. In view of the circumstances we felt compelled to recede.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, when this matter was brought up several days ago I moved that the conferees adhere to the item placed in the bill by the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Senator did not move that the conferees adhere; he made a motion that the conferees be instructed—and he used the word "instructed" instead of "adhere"—but after the motion was made to adopt the report, to appoint another conference committee, and that the Senate insist upon its amendment, the motion of the Senator from California was not carried. If it had been carried, however, the conferees would have been compelled to act just as they have acted in this instance.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I do not know the exact language in which I made the motion, but it was my intention at the time to move that the conferees adhere to the amendment of the Senate, and the Chair ruled, in confirmation of what I say and of what was my intention, that the motion was out of order at that time, whereupon the Senator from Wyoming moved that the conferees be instructed to maintain their position with respect to that item. Now, the conferees come in here in disobedience, I may say, to the instructions of the Senate, having conceded the point made by the House. Of course, we can never get a provision for the repair of vessels of the Navy unless we insist, even to the point of defeating the conference report, on the amendment inserted by the Senate. I desire now to inquire, Is it in order to move that the conferees be further instructed to adhere?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that such a motion would not be in order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is about to rule upon an inquiry made by the Senator from California.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Chair's pardon; I did not know an inquiry had been made. I rose to make a point of order; that is the reason I interrupted.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator ought to be advised that the matter is entirely closed so far as the conferees are concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was answering a parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from California, which is whether a motion to instruct the conferees further to adhere to the Senate amendment is in order. The Chair is of the opinion that it would not be in order; that the only question now is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. PHELAN. Then the only possible way to restore the item for the repair of the Navy, which is in very bad need of repair, is to vote down the conference report.

Mr. LODGE. That is the only way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion suggested by the Senator from California is not in order, and that the only question before the Senate is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we are not bound to agree to the conference report. We have the power to reject the conference report, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair knows of nothing that interferes with the liberty of the Senate to do so.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the motion before the Senate is the one made by me for the adoption of the conference report. If the vote is "no" upon that, then the conference report is open to further disposition, but the question must first be put whether we shall adopt the report.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair suggest that the Senator from Wyoming asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the report? That consent has not yet been given. The Chair asks now, Is there objection?

Mr. PITTMAN. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. That is not as it occurred, as I understand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because of the very violent opposition to this report on the part of the Senator from California——

Mr. WARREN. I asked unanimous consent to take up the report, and supposed consent had been given; and then I moved to adopt the report. That is the motion, as I understand, which is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Wyoming to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the report.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator needed no consent to present the report. If, however, the Chair misunderstood the Senator from Wyoming, the question now is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. According to my understanding of parliamentary law, the Senator need not have asked unanimous consent. All he has to do is to make a motion and put the motion before the Senate. Has the Chair ruled that unanimous consent was necessary?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator state his question a little more clearly? The Chair is unable to hear him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said that I thought the Senator from Wyoming need not have asked unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has just stated that the Senator from Wyoming did not need unanimous consent to present the report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I thought.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, let me suggest that we were in executive session, and, being in executive session, it would seem that unanimous consent was necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not of that opinion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know whether we were in executive session or not, but my parliamentary inquiry is this: Does this suggestion—for if it is a motion it does not need unanimous consent—does this suggestion need unanimous consent or not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it does not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the Chair is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is very much obliged to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Chair need not be obliged. Every now and then the Chair's ruling agrees with my judgment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Once in a while.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And whenever it does, of course the Chair is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Wyoming, after having presented the report, moved its consideration. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

On a division, the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in legislative session, proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on H. R. 12046, the second urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, last week, when I was momentarily absent from the Senate Chamber, there was attached to the deficiency appropriation bill an amendment increasing by half a million dollars the appropriation for what is known as the Speedway Hospital enterprise in Chicago, and in the brief discussion which ensued there apparently was an implication of unnecessary and even inordinate delay in the consummation of this contract by the Secretary of the Treasury. I desire to state to the Senate that there was not one particle of delay that might reasonably be attributed to the Treasury Department.

This, I believe, is the fourth time that this particular matter has been brought to the attention of the Congress, and each time the attorney for this hospital scheme has had the act altered as he proposed. Unhappily for him and his clients, however, the Treasury Department was yet compelled to proceed under statutory limitations as to the total cost.

In the first place, the Congress appropriated the sum of $3,000,000 for the acquirement and completion of this Speedway Hospital enterprise, with a proviso which gave to the Secretary of the Treasury discretion to build with the $3,000,000 an entirely new hospital. In the circumstances, the Secretary of the Treasury proceeded to inquire whether or not it would be to the advantage of the Government to acquire and complete this war-emergency hospital or to use the $3,000,000 with which to build a new, modern Government hospital on land owned by the Government in the Chicago territory. As soon as it was ascertained that the Secretary of the Treasury was considering this alternate plan authorized by the act of Congress there was attached to an appropriation bill, at the suggestion of the attorney for the owners and contractors of the Speedway Hospital, an amendment of the statute which took away from the Secretary of the Treasury all discretion in the matter and required him to acquire this Speedway property "and adapt it to the needs and purposes of the Public Health Service," within a limit of $3,000,000 as to cost.

Had the discretion originally given to the Secretary of the Treasury not been summarily withdrawn, the Government, in my considered judgment, would long ago have gotten a modern hospital. The only way to ascertain the needs and purposes of the Public Health Service in the circumstances was to have the officials of the service state their needs, and this was required to be done.

The Public Health Service did state to the Supervising Architect of the Treasury what was required, and the Supervising Architect's Office, as soon as possible thereafter, reported to the Secretary of the Treasury that an additional appropriation of $2,500,000 would be required to meet completely the needs and purposes of the service; that is to say, to build an absolutely modern hospital, completely equipped, would require that sum; and the Secretary of the Treasury immediately reported the fact to the Congress. Thereupon the attorney for the owners and contractors of this Speedway Hospital again intervened, and induced the Congress to reject the proposal for a complete hospital plant. He prevailed with his counter suggestion again to amend the statute by requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire this particular property and to complete the project in accordance with certain designated plans and specifications for $3,000,000, assuring the Congress that his clients were eager to do the work within that limitation as to cost. Thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury caused to be drafted a contract for the signature of the owners and contractors. It was then disclosed that the owners and contractors of the Speedway Hospital were not at that time, nor had they ever been, willing to sign a contract for the disposal and completion of this Speedway Hospital for the sum prescribed by Congress. Although urged, they utterly refused to sign the contract unless the Secretary of the Treasury would consent to have embodied in it a provision, tucked away in the old war-emergency proposal, which would have enabled the owners and contractors to charge the Government an indeterminate sum for the completion of the hospital. The Secretary of the Treasury did not feel authorized to go beyond the precise limit prescribed by law, and refused to permit the insertion of a clause of that description in the contract.

Now, for the fourth time, the owners and contractors of this Speedway project, through their attorney, appear at the Capitol and are proposing that the limit originally prescribed by Congress be increased by the sum of $400,000. The Supervising Architect's Office of the Treasury estimated that the sum asked for this hospital building in its present incomplete state was from $250,000 to $300,000 in excess of its actual cost; so that, counting $250,000 as the minimum excess, and adding it to the $400,000 additional now provided, it is my judgment that the Congress is simply making a gift of $650,000 to the owners and contractors of this property.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I have not seen the final provision as agreed upon, but I should like to ask whether the provision as agreed to provides that the owners and the contractors shall not receive a profit upon this hospital?

Mr. WARREN. It does. It provides absolutely that no one connected with it shall have a profit.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia how he can possibly make the statement that this is a gift of $650,000 to the owners of the property?

Mr. GLASS. Because it is the estimate of the Supervising Architect's Office that, to begin with, the owners and contractors will receive $250,000 in excess of the cost to them of the building as it stands to-day, and right there is a gift of $250,000.

Mr. LENROOT. But, if the Senator will yield, does not the provision that is agreed upon in the conference report absolutely prohibit that profit?

Mr. GLASS. No.

Mr. LENROOT. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. GLASS. The provision does not touch that profit at all.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think I can say something that will substantiate in some degree the statement of the Senator and perhaps give him some information, too. I do not, however, want to proceed until he has finished, unless he wishes.

Mr. GLASS. It does not disturb me at all to be interrupted.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say that this matter is one that has been before the committee several times. In the first place, it was not inaugurated through the Committee on Appropriations. It was provided for in an omnibus bill for that and other hospitals, and the Committee on Appropriations, which is now handling it, had nothing whatever to do with it at that time; but those on the original committee examined this project, and later it was presented to the Committee on Appropriations to make some provision that would help the Secretary of the Treasury, if he needed help, to be able to make the contract.

As to the earlier transactions, or rather the absence of transactions, perhaps I should say—the Senator will correct me if I am wrong—of the early part of it, I know nothing. The first that I knew of this mater was when those interested came before the committee asking for some language that would enable the Secretary of the Treasury to accept it if in his judgment he saw fit. It was still entirely in his judgment. At one time the Secretary was before the committee, and it developed, or had developed before, and I suppose then, that the officers of the Public Health Service differed somewhat in their different estimates as to what they wanted done; and not only that, but they differed in their votes at different times as to what they needed or would accept.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. GLASS. Can the Senator tell the Senate why the original statute was so amended as to deprive the Secretary of the Treasury of the discretion given him either to acquire this property or to spend the $3,000,000 to build a Government hospital on Government-owned property in the Chicago territory?

Mr. WARREN. So far as the members of the Committee on Appropriations are concerned, they had no part in any such beginning or outcome as that. It was represented to them that the language that they introduced in the bill would enable the Secretary to say yes or no to that proposition. I am not saying that it did that.

Later there came another proposition. The second proposition was confined to the $3,000,000 and to asking the Secretary to complete the transaction, if he could, under that limit. I am assuming that the Secretary of the Treasury could not. I am assuming that he is declaring what is undoubtedly true, that the contractors would not contract for the hospital to finish its construction under the requirements of the Public Health Service and keep within this amount of money.

We now come to the present bill, when the present Secretary of the Treasury again applied for or rather indorsed an application for some legislation. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and, I think, his associate members on the subcommittee, agreed that they would not touch this thing again unless there was to be an absolute settlement and unless we knew exactly to a cent the utmost limit that it should cost. This matter was not considered by the committee further until we had two communications, one in the form of an amendment and the other a communication which was a copy of a long telegram—I take it to be a telegram—sent by the Secretary of the Treasury to the contractors at Chicago asking if they would complete this hospital with such additions as he might require, all subject to the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and insure that the cost should not exceed $3,500,000 for the entire matter, the contractor to accept all responsibility for accidents and incidents of every kind and character, so that it would be a positive insurance against greater cost to the Government. The committee thought it better to end the matter, and an amendment was introduced as presented and also there was placed in the RECORD a copy of the correspondence between the Secretary and the contractor, which was the guaranty.

We sent for the Secretary of the Treasury to come before the subcommittee and took a record of his understanding about it and his wishes and what he thought could be done. He felt that possibly yet it might be finished under the $3,000,000 by some changes under the Supervising Architect, and with the cooperation of the Public Health Service, but the chairman of the committee had demanded and the committee had demanded some guaranty as to ultimate cost, beyond which it could not and would not go under any circumstances.

So the matter went into the bill and passed the Senate, went to the House, and came to conference in the usual way on a failure to accept any of our amendments. Then in conference we summoned before us again the Secretary of the Treasury, so he might fully state what the understanding was and what he proposed to insure, and it went back to the House in disagreement. It was considered by the House extensively, and they voted on a motion to ask us to recede. The vote was 91 against 201 to sustain the amendment, not exactly as we had it, but changed in language somewhat as it appears now and as it has been read from the desk.

I think, as the Senator probably knows, as I have stated, and as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has brought out, that there is an inhibition that not any profit shall be made in the establishment from the first of it to the last of it, up to the time it is finally settled. If the Secretary of the Treasury takes up the examination of that, and is able to ascertain the exact cost, which undoubtedly he can, there is not a dollar or a nickel of profit from first to last under this legislation.

Mr. GLASS. I think perhaps the House has gotten into a mood over this question that some Senators say the country has gotten into over the peace treaty. They have gotten so utterly tired of it that they want it settled in some way, and apparently do not care very much how it is settled, just so it is ended. I will frankly say to the Senator that I have no expectation of reversing or modifying the action of the committee on this question. I rose primarily to resent the implication that there had been any effort made on the part of the Treasury Department to hinder the matter.

Mr. WARREN. I have not at any time or anywhere to my knowledge hinted at any hindrance in the Treasury Department because there was any intention other than to carry out the law.

Mr. GLASS. I think that is absolutely so.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say now to the Senator that from the time I first became acquainted with this proposition I have seen nothing that has led me to think that the Secretary of the Treasury, the former Secretary, who is now an honored Member of this body, has done anything there but what any one of us might have done in the same place to properly protect the country.

Mr. GLASS. I am obliged to the Senator for making that statement. I must insist, however, that had not the Congress evinced such a ready disposition to respond to any request that was made by the attorney for the owners and contractors of this Speedway Hospital, it is my belief that we would not now be compelled to expend this additional $400,000.

I think, furthermore, that the chairman of the committee is mistaken in saying that the law has now been so amended as to prohibit any profit whatsoever to the owners and contractors. That may be related to this additional $400,000——

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. If the Senator will read it carefully, he will find that it refers back to the entire $3,400,000.

Mr. GLASS. I had not so interpreted it; and if that be true I have nothing further to say about the matter, except that the Treasury Department has not unreasonably delayed the consummation of the project in any sense.

I would call attention to the fact that on February 19 the attorney for the owners and contractors of this Speedway Hospital appeared before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House and definitely stated that his last modification of the law did not "involve one cent of increased cost" to the Government. This attorney was asked by a member of the committee this question:

Do you mean to say this amendment now does not increase the appropriation at all?

The attorney responded:

Not a penny.

That was on the 19th of last month, and we see to-day how true that is, because we have extended the limit of appropriation by $400,000.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator if, while he was Secretary of the Treasury, he made a report to Congress recommending an increase of $2,500,000 instead of $400,000 for the purpose of acquiring this property and completing a modern plant?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and I would vote for an appropriation of $2,500,000 to-day, because that would give us a complete modern hospital, whereas according to the officials of the Public Health Service this will give us a hospital which will be "an eyesore and a disgrace to the Nation for all time."

Mr. WARREN. Just a moment as to the proposition of completing it within $3,000,000. Coupled with that was the proposition to take back part of the land and, in place of bronze and brass trimmings, to put on the ordinary black trimmings, and so forth, which might or might not make that difference. But, as I said, we have the assurance of the present Secretary, as well as the statement of the contractors, that in the drawing of this contract $3,400,000 is simply the utmost limit of insurance that can be reached, while the intention is still to keep within the figures that the Senator has mentioned of the $3,000,000; but the contractors have refused, as the Senator stated, to sign a contract to absolutely finish it for that, and the difference comes in the allowance for contingencies and for increased wages and cost of materials, which have been brought about by the delay, and so forth.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that the proposition made to the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on the 19th of February did not involve taking back any of the land. It involved the acquisition of the entire property and the completion of the buildings according to designated plans and specifications. The attorneys for the owners and contractors definitely and unqualifiedly stated that they would do this within the $3,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator stated the 19th of February; does he mean this last month?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WARREN. If I may ask one first. Has the Senator from Virginia examined all of the evidence that was given at that time? I know what the Senator refers to, because it was before us.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; every particle of it, I will say.

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to ask the Senator whether this additional appropriation of $400,000, making a total of $3,400,000, will represent all the moneys to be invested in this building and grounds? In other words, does the $3,400,000 complete the project?

Mr. WARREN. It does.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Government hereafter be compelled to make other appropriations to finish the building?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that I would not be standing here saying one word about that hospital if the committee had not had that brought in such shape that it is an absolute closure, and the $400,000 is intended more as an insurance than a possible expenditure; but the contract they have agreed to sign, and the only contract which the present Secretary of the Treasury says he will sign, will cover that, so that there can be no contingency whatever on account of God, man, or the elements which shall prevent the completion of the building on the part of the contractors and former owners inside of the $3,400,000, and they will be under heavy bond.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the statute so declare?

Mr. WARREN. It so declares as nearly as can be in a telegram, where the question is asked and the answer is accepted. It was in the RECORD some days ago; but we had, as I say, assurance not only of the men interested in the hospital itself but from the Secretary of the Treasury, absolutely his word that that kind of a contract was the only one that should be entered into—and the Supervising Architect was also there—and he proposed that there should be such contracting done, if any could be made, and such a watching by the Supervising Architect as should provide for making that a less sum; and these parties did not reserve any chance of disputing the word or findings of the Supervising Architect under the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator must know, at least I know, that what is meant is the completion of this particular Speedway Hospital building and five auxiliary buildings according to certain plans and specifications. The testimony of the Public Health Service is that the completion of the project in this way will not give us a modern hospital, will not furnish a hospital at all adequate to take care of that middle western territory; and, moreover, it does not give a hospital into which, without further considerable expenditures, patients can immediately be admitted. It provides for no equipment of any description. It omits some very essential structural units. I make the prediction here and now that before you shall have gotten a hospital there suitable for the effective care of patients you must appropriate other large sums; and before we shall have a real modern plant we must expend from $1,000,000 to $2,500,000 more.

Mr. WARREN. That may be the Senator's opinion. It is not mine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the Senator whether, in the provision now submitted to the Senate, it is provided that no further appropriation shall be made for this particular service?

Mr. WARREN. It provides that it shall be finished completely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would the Senator mind reading to me the provision?

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not quite agree with the Senator. It reads as follows——

Mr. WARREN. I would rather have it read from the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out at once the provisions of paragraphs A and B of section 7 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines," approved March 3, 1919, the limit of cost of the acquisition of the site and uncompleted building and the completion of the construction of hospital buildings in Cook County, Ill., authorized by said act, is hereby increased from $3,000,000 to $3,400,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into contracts therefor within the total limit of cost thereby fixed: Provided, That no part of said sum so authorized shall be used to pay any profit to either the owners of the land and present uncompleted building, Edward Hines and the Shank Co., or to the contractors for the completion of the work.

Mr. KING. I do not know what it means.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this reads:

The limit of cost of the acquisition of the site and uncompleted building and the completion of the construction of hospital buildings.

"The limit of cost of the acquisition"—that is as far as the amendment goes.

Mr. WARREN. It is $3,400,000. That is the total cost.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; it is the limit of cost of the acquisition. Of course, we all know as Senators——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator did not read the entire article. That is not the entire article touching the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I understand that; but that is the entire paragraph, and that defines that paragraph, that specifies what that paragraph means. Of course there follows this language:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into contracts therefor within the total limit of cost—

Of cost—c-o-s-t—

thereby fixed: Provided, That no part of said sum—

What does "said sum" mean? The said sum of cost—c-o-s-t—

so authorized shall be used to pay any profit to either the owners of the land and present uncompleted building, Edward Hines and the Shank Co., or to the contractor for the completion of the work.

We are all acquainted with the rivers and harbors bills and public building bills, with the idea of appropriating for the original cost, to be followed up later by something else.

Mr. WARREN. The bill to which this is an amendment contains language providing what the whole cost shall be and provides that it shall not be beyond the sum therein provided, so that this is really a part of the original provision in which the limit is fixed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is, the limit of cost?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it is not a limit as to improvements, ameliorations, extensions, and all the balance of it.

Mr. WARREN. It covers all that the Secretary of the Treasury may call for, whatever that may be, under the contract that he is to make.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment is one drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury. The other part of it, which was not read, shows that whatever changes are necessary to adapt the hospital to the wants of the Public Health Service shall be provided for; that the contractors must do what the Secretary and the Supervising Architect require shall be done; and that the cost of minor changes as they go along will be estimated as they go along by the Supervising Architect, but that the final expense to the Government shall not in any case exceed $3,400,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not read the law as the Senator from Wyoming has proffered it to the Senate in the way in which he construes it. I read the law to be that there shall be this appropriation for the cost, but that they are left perfectly free afterwards to go ahead. It looks like a pension bill. So much is appropriated right now, but the door is left open to appropriate, if necessary, a hundred million dollars more later on. It seems to me that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has been exactly right in his criticism. I suppose, of course, that the item will pass through, and likewise suppose, of course, that there will have to be another appropriation of something like a half million dollars to make this scheme go through. The present language of the law does not complete the project; it merely starts the project at a certain cost, but says nothing about improvements, repairs, extensions, and other similar items.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with reference to the character of this hospital when completed, I send to the Secretary's desk a letter from Surgeon General Rupert Blue to the Secretary of the Treasury, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

MARCH 4, 1919.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: Referring to legislation to provide immediate additional hospital and sanatorium facilities, approved by the President on March 3, 1919, and particularly to section 7, paragraph b, authorizing the Secretary in his discretion to execute the contract with the Shank Co. for the land and erection thereon of buildings specified, I have the honor to report that in order to expedite all matters relating to the supply of additional hospital accommodations as contemplated in the bill, a complete investigation of this project, including its location, surroundings, and adaptability for the needs of the Public Health Service in caring for the patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau and others provided for in the bill, has been made, and there is attached herewith a copy of a report thereon.

The contract, plans, and specifications have been carefully inspected and I find that the construction provided for is of a high-class fireproof type, well adapted for the needs of the service, and I therefore recommend that the contract be executed for the completion of the building under the terms of the contract and as provided for in the legislation.

Respectfully,

RUPERT BLUE, Surgeon General.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that the letter which has just been read was written March 4, 1919—a year ago—when the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, naturally intent on expanding his bureau, had not personally inspected the site or hospital buildings nor made anything like an adequate survey of hospital requirements. Subsequently the Surgeon General reported to the Secretary of the Treasury that to undertake to complete the Speedway Hospital project within the limit of $3,000,000, and according to the contracted plans and specifications to which reference is made in the letter, would provide the country an institution which would be a perpetual eyesore and a discredit to the Nation. That report was made last December and the substance of it communicated by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, it seems that the attitude of the other House with respect to this item for the repair of ships of the Navy is the governing factor in the consideration of this matter by the Senate. There is a feeling that, on account of the large vote by which the item was rejected by the other House, therefore it can not be adopted at all. The House of Representatives is hostile to any legislation just at this time which involves a large expenditure of money, and as the great majority of the Members are from States in the interior, where they never feel the necessity of naval protection, it is not surprising that such is the fact.

I remember that when it was sought to establish nitrogen and munition plants upon the coast, the Navy Department held that such institutions should be established west of the Alleghanies or east of the Sierras, because there was no danger to the interior of the United States from offensive operations by hostile fleets. That has led the good people of the interior of the country to believe that there is never any urgent necessity for keeping the Navy in a fighting condition.

I have been deeply impressed by the reports of the operating officers of the Navy. Admiral Coontz recently said the inefficient condition of the Navy is—a direct result of a lack of funds with which to prosecute vigorously the required repair work on vessels whose material fitness has been lowered through the excessive and continuous demands of war service.

Our fleets have come home from the war and are now being repaired just in that measure which Congress will allow by the appropriation of funds. Both Admiral Coontz and Admiral Taylor agree than $10,000,000 is the irreducible minimum. We have sought to provide $3,000,000, but the House of Representatives rejects that.

I will refer to an emergency which may bring to the mind of the House, not of the Senate, the necessity of keeping ships in repair. At the last meeting of the Senate, when this matter was being considered, I mentioned the serious condition of the Hawaiian Islands, where, I believe, will develop the spark which in this belligerent world sooner or later will cause the explosion to precipitate another war. There is in the islands now a strike of the 120,000 Japanese against the white planters. I have here the Pacific Commercial Advertiser, of Honolulu, of February 8, containing an editorial which declares:

Hawaii stands to-day at the dividing of the ways. Upon the outcome of the Japanese conspiracy against the Americanism of these islands depends the future of the Territory. Unless the conspiracy is crushed and those who instigated it are rendered powerless to continue their plotting against American citizens and American industry, Hawaii will inevitably lose her autonomy and be placed under a commission form of government.

Uncle Sam can not afford to have Hawaii under the domination of an alien race. If such a thing should come about, it would be necessary for him to step in and take charge.

"A proposal has been made that a mass meeting of citizens be called," and that they agitate in various ways to bring about finally a settlement of this question, so far as they are able so to do, without appealing to the United States.

It adds:

The Japanese press of Hawaii has constantly preached anti-Americanism. It is preaching it to-day. It will continue to preach it as long as no adequate action is taken to put a stop to it.

In that connection, as to the seriousness of the crisis there, where there are many incendiary cane fires and other evidences of violence, I stated that a Japanese warship was in the harbor. I made that statement upon the authority of a member of the Hawaiian Commission now in this city. I see that it was denied in the New York press on Sunday that there was a Japanese warship there. So the member of the Hawaiian Commission sends me this paper in which there is the following statement, which was his authority:

The Japanese naval training cruiser—

Which is an equipped warship—

Yakumo, which visited Honolulu and Hilo the latter part of November last, will be in Hononlulu again on March 8—

That was the reason why I stated that a warship was in those waters.

Under all these circumstances—and the Pacific is not the only locality where trouble is developing—I think the Senate should adhere to its original intention to provide funds for the repair of vessels of the Navy. While the appropriation proposed is inadequate, I think the Senate should continue to show an earnest desire, at any rate, to keep our fighting ships in repair. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 2, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the gift of life with its precious hopes and promises; the old world in which Thou hast placed us, as sojourners, with its splendid opportunities to develop all that is best in us; the sun which shines by day; the stars which shine by night; the change of seasons, seedtime and harvest; its fertile soil which yields abundantly to the husbandmen; its rich deposits which meet all the necessities of life; home with its joys, society, government, educational institutions, churches, and philanthropic organizations.

The tenure of this life is brief and we are called upon to work while it is yet day, for the night cometh when no man can work.

Death has once more entered the congressional family and taken away the veteran Member of the upper House. Comfort his family, numerous friends, in Thine own way, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE TO ATTEND FUNERAL OF THE LATE SENATOR BANKHEAD.

The SPEAKER appointed the following committee to attend the funeral of the late Senator BANKHEAD:

Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. DENT, Mr. BLACKMON, Mr. ALMON, Mr. OLIVER, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. STEAGALL, Mr. McDUFFIE, Mr. RAINEY of Alabama, Mr. MANN of Illinois, Mr. TOWNER, Mr. STEENERSON, Mr. MOON, Mr. HUMPHREYS, Mr. McCLINTIC, Mr. CANDLER, and Mr. WINGO.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Governor of the State of Oklahoma announcing the ratification by the legislature of that State of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

THE LATE WILLIAM A. STONE, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes, to announce the death of a former Member of this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, in Pennsylvania yesterday there passed to the shadowy beyond a former Member of this House, who subsequently attained the governorship of the Keystone State and died as prothonotary of the supreme court of that Commonwealth. William A. Stone was a self-made man and a masterful man. His services in the Fifty-second, Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, and Fifty-fifth Congresses are remembered by men who yet occupy seats in this House. His career embraced heroic services as a boy in the struggle to preserve the Union; as a returned soldier, he did chores and menial work to enable him to pursue the study of law; as United States district attorney for the Pittsburgh district, he acquitted himself with credit; and after serving eight years faithfully in this House he was elected governor of his native State by more than 100,000 majority at a time when bitter factionalism and partisanship ran riot.

Being a member of Gov. Stone's cabinet, I came to know him well. He elicited the high esteem and regard of his associates because of his engaging qualities of heart and mind; because of his loyalty to friends, to his party, his State, and Nation; and because of his detestation of the arts of deceit and of the demagogue. William A. Stone was a true man. Peace be his portion.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3076) authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdictions, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3119. An act for the relief of Con Murphy.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 12467) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, and Mr. MCKELLAR as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate resolution 316.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD, late a Senator from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That a committee of nine Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate to take order for superintending the funeral of the late Senator.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the remains of the dead Senator be removed from Washington to Jasper, Ala., for burial in charge of the Sergeant at Arms, attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

And in compliance with the foregoing resolution the Vice President had appointed Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. NELSON, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. BALL, and Mr. HARRISON as the committee on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. FLETCHER as a manager on the part of the Senate at the conference on the bill (H. R. 3184) entitled "An act to create a Federal power commission and to define its powers and duties; to provide for the improvement of navigation; for the development of water power for the use of lands of the United States in relation thereto; to repeal section 18 of 'An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes,' approved August 8, 1917," and for other purposes, in place of Mr. BANKHEAD.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 3119. An act for the relief of Con Murphy; to the Committee on Claims.

THE RECORD.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit an inquiry with reference to the correctness of the RECORD of yesterday. I notice that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] is reported as voting "yea" for the Spanish War pension bill. I understood him to vote "present." Possibly he changed his vote later, but if not the RECORD does him an injustice, and I should like to know whether it was changed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is present himself and can probably inform the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas is desirous, probably, of getting up a controversy because of the fact that last evening when he asked for additional time to address the House I objected. That is the answer to his request.

Mr. LITTLE. But that does not answer the inquiry. I challenge the correctness of the RECORD, unless he changed his vote.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will state the facts——

Mr. LITTLE. The facts are that he voted "present" on the first roll call. I do not know whether he changed it afterwards or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LITTLE. I guess that it has been answered.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, the House in its action on the conference report upon the bill H. R. 12046, the second deficiency bill, adopted the conference report and took action with regard to the three remaining items that were in disagreement. The first was the amendment of the Senate carrying $1,000,000 for the enforcement of the prohibition act. The next was the Senate amendment No. 22, relating to the Chicago hospital, and the third was the appropriation of $3,000,000 for the Navy Department. The House conferees have met with the conferees of the Senate, and we have come to a complete agreement, the Senate receding on its amendment No. 17 with regard to prohibition, also receding on its disagreement on amendment No. 22 with regard to the Chicago hospital, which amendment was changed in accordance with some minor suggestions by the Supervising Architect so as to make clear the provision that the authority was given to enter into the contract, and also that there should be no profits paid out of it to the owner or the contractor, and the Senate also receded from the third matter in disagreement. We have come to a complete agreement, therefore, and the position of the House on all of these items has been agreed to by the conferees.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Was the third amendment the Lodge amendment?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. And the Senate receded from that?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is this the last of that Chicago hospital quarrel?

Mr. GOOD. I certainly hope so. We tried to make it sure that the matter was absolutely clear. I now present the conference report and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. KITCHIN. How much is now appropriated for the Speedway Hospital?

Mr. GOOD. Three million dollars, with an authorized limit of cost raised to $3,400,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has this matter been taken up with the minority member of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina is sick in bed. I told him what my plan was, and he said that it met with his approval.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The conference report was read.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12046) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 17 and 34.

Amendment numbered 22: That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed insert the following:

"To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out at once the provisions of paragraphs A and B of section 7 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines,' approved March 3, 1919, the limit of cost of the acquisition of the site and uncompleted building and the completion of the construction of hospital buildings in Cook County, Ill., authorized by said act, is hereby increased from $3,000,000 to $3,400,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into contracts therefor within the total limit of cost hereby fixed: Provided, That no part of said sum so authorized shall be used to pay any profit to either the owners of the land and present uncompleted building, Edward Hines and the Shank Co., or to the contractor for the completion of the work."

And the House agree to the same.

J. G. CANNON,
JAMES F. BYRNES,

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate, Nos. 17, 22, and 34, to the bill (H. R. 12046) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, namely:

On No. 17: Strikes out the appropriation of $1,000,000, inserted by the Senate, to enable the Customs Service to enforce the laws governing the importation and exportation of intoxicating liquors.

On No. 22, relating to the hospital in Cook County, Ill.: Inserts a substitute for the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate, which substitute modifies the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate as follows: Corrects verbal errors in quoting the title of the act of March 3, 1919; makes verbal corrections in the text of the amendment in referring to the present uncompleted building and the proposed buildings; inserts authority for the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contracts for the uncompleted building and the proposed buildings within the extended limit of cost; modifies the limitation upon the payment of profits so that it shall extend to the entire sum authorized; and makes clear the owners of the land and present uncompleted building by inserting the names of Edward Hines and the Shank Co.

On No. 34: Strikes out the appropriation of $3,000,000, inserted by the Senate, for the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department.

JAMES W. GOOD,
J. G. CANNON,
JAMES F. BYRNES,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a short editorial from this morning's Washington Post on disabled soldiers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an editorial from this morning's Post on disabled soldiers. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE DECLARATION OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF TEXAS.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this is the anniversary of the declaration of independence of Texas, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 15 minutes on that subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes on the subject of the anniversary of the declaration of independence of Texas. Is there objection?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I suggest to the gentleman to withhold his request for a moment while the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] disposes of a little matter which he has been trying to get before the House for two days?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas first. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I feel that this day should not pass without a word in appreciation of the heroic service it brings to mind.

Assembled in convention at Washington, on the Brazos, 84 years ago to-day a small band of patriots, descendants of Puritan and Cavalier alike and embodying the best virtues of their parent stocks, threw off the yoke of Mexico in a formal declaration of independence. [Applause.] They were summoned to this task of freemen by the worth of their character and the strength of their will. Such men, free in their hearts and consciences even in bondage, could not bow to autocracy.

A brief survey of the conditions in Texas will reflect the spirit of this convention. The Texans had endured under Mexican rule a series of oppressive wrongs which found its culmination in the deeds of the dictator Santa Anna, the self-styled "Napoleon of the West." Largely through his unbridled caprice civil liberty had given way to military despotism in the government of the Texans. They were ruled by laws in a foreign tongue, attached for political purposes against their will to Coahuila, surrounded and harassed by mercenary military forces quartered in their midst, and practically denied the right of trial by jury and a system of public education.

It was a little company that Santa Anna dealt with and sought in this manner to crush, but their principle, their purpose, their power, were beyond the selfish scope of his autocratic vision. Liberty is known by its fruits. Since the dawn of history it has triumphed "not by might nor by power" but by devotion without stint of life and fortune to its vicarious service. These Texans loved their country with their blood.

From the time of the early attempts at colonization by La Salle and his followers Texas had been traded about as a territorial slave from one master nation to another. Spain and France had vied with each other for its broad domain. But now its chief asset was a league of men and not of land, men who had built their cabin homes from the sturdy timbers of the forest and who stood with hearts of oak ready to defend them. Their story is a glorious record of the accomplishments of pioneers and patriots.

In the brief time allotted me I shall not endeavor to epitomize a history so entrancing. I shall seek merely to suggest the spirit which makes its study so inviting.

The pioneers who met in that convention of March 1, 1836, were schooled in the tenets of American freedom. The delegates represented settlers who had come from every part of the New World. The signers hailed from Alabama, the Territory of Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, North and South Carolina, New York, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Virginia. They knew almost as an experience how the Continental Congress had grown tired of inequality and injustice and had determined to assert the rights of a free people. They remembered the circumstances under which Thomas Jefferson, a young man of 33 years, gave evidence of his budding genius by drafting the Declaration of Independence of the United States from the fullness of his own mind. There was similar oppression to inspire them to a similar resolution. Accordingly, on the following day, March 2, 1836, they severed forever with their memorable document the arbitrary tie which linked their political fortunes with Mexico.

This convention was held in an unfinished building. There were rude openings for doors and windows, covered with cotton cloth which did not wholly exclude the cold air of the inclement day. There, under circumstances so humble and conditions so severe, was the Texan declaration of independence unanimously adopted, and there, poor in purse but rich in spirit, was born a new republic of the West.

The convention adopted a constitution and, driven by the stern necessities of war, assumed the prerogative of selecting temporary officers. They were: President, David G. Burnet; vice president, Lorenzo de Zavalla; a cabinet of five members; and a commander in chief of the army, Gen. Sam Houston.

Indissolubly connected with the history of this convention is the matchless story of the Alamo. Before its adjournment the Alamo had fallen. Including the sick and wounded, the fortress had been held by 182 men. Typical of the spirit which inspired them was the letter written by their commander, Col. William Barret Travis, and sent from the Alamo on the 24th day of February, 1836. This stirring appeal and the subsequent bravery which attested its sincerity are enough to make the blood of the patriotic American tingle with pride as it courses through his veins. Listen!

To the people of Texas and all Americans in the world:

Fellow citizens and compatriots, I am besieged by a thousand or more of the Mexicans under Santa Anna. I have sustained a continued bombardment and cannonade for 24 hours and have not lost a man. The enemy has demanded a surrender at discretion; otherwise the garrison are to be put to the sword if the fort is taken. I have answered the demand with a cannon shot—and our flag still waves proudly from the walls. I shall never surrender or retreat. Then I call on you, in the name of liberty, of patriotism, and everything dear to the American character, to come to our aid with all dispatch. The enemy is receiving reinforcements daily and will no doubt increase to three or four thousand in four or five days. If this call is neglected I am determined to sustain myself as long as possible and die like a soldier who never forgets what is due to his own honor and that of his country. Victory or death!

[Applause]—

[Applause.]

In the spirit of that message Travis and Crockett, Bonham and Bowie, and the band of heroic martyrs who battled and bled with them, gave their lives gloriously for their country at this shrine of liberty. A thousand of the foe had fallen at their right hand and a thousand more were yet to perish through the forceful and inspiring power of their example.

In that same fateful March occurred the massacre at Goliad. There Mexican perfidy followed Mexican promises. The same brutal, cold-blooded Santa Anna was the author of each. The gallant Texans, under Col. Fannin, were lured and trapped to their death, and on Palm Sunday morning they poured forth their blood in sacrificial service that it might cry out from the ground for vengeance and call the sons of men to the cause of freedom. [Applause.]

The despot now felt that his career of tyranny was assured, but he was untutored in the laws of liberty. The sacrifices of the Alamo and Goliad served as stepping stones to the glorious victory of the Texans at San Jacinto. By that triumph, on April 21, 1836, Mexican might surrendered to Texan right. The battle field was the territory between Buffalo Bayou and the San Jacinto River. The Texans were led by Gen. Sam Houston, a victor in campaigns civil and martial. It is worthy of note that his career included service in each house of the National Congress, the governorship of two States, and the presidency of a Republic. The fighting remnant of his little army was eager for the unequal contest.

"The twin sisters," two small cannon which had been given to the Texans by sympathetic citizens of Cincinnati, were lodged at crucial places. Deaf Smith was detailed to cut down Vince's bridge across the bayou, and thus preclude the possibility of retreat. A new government of free people was to rise or fall with that engagement.

Rending the air with their cries of "Remember the Alamo! Remember Goliad!" the followers of Houston fell with righteous fury on the forces of Santa Anna. The Mexican hordes found little comfort in their greater numerical strength. The spirits of Travis and Crockett and Fannin and Bowie were pointing the way to Houston and his men. When they had fired their rifles they used them as clubs, and in the hand-to-hand struggle which ensued resorted to their bowie knives. The vaunted Mexican supremacy of the dictator sought vainly to take refuge in flight. The Texans pursued, killing and capturing the panic-stricken soldiers, many of whom cravenly fell on their knees shouting, "Me no Alamo! Me no Goliad!"

The results of the battle proclaim the signal victory. The casualties of the Texans were 8 dead and 27 wounded. A wound sustained by Gen. Houston caused him to limp during the remainder of his life. The Mexicans lost 630 killed and 730 prisoners, of whom 208 were wounded. Santa Anna was among the captured.

It may be interesting, though doubtless a work of supererogation and somewhat aside from the purpose of these remarks, to trace briefly in a parallel way the history of the United States and Texas during this interesting era. We have seen that each declared its independence and adopted a constitution. Each sought also to remove inequality and administer justice as a republic. On March 1, 1837, the United States recognized Texas as a free and independent country. There was an unsuccessful attempt at reconsideration next day, which makes March 2 doubly a memorable date in our history. France, Holland, Belgium, and England subsequently took similar action, and France sent a minister to the new government.

The Federal Government had its Presidents. So did Texas. It had its Congress. So did Texas. It had its flag, as Gov. Winthrop once said, "A star for every State and a State for every star." Texas had its flag. Other States had their emblems and banners, it is true, but Texas had its flag, bathed in and bought by the blood of its martyred heroes. [Applause.] In this respect, also, it is a Lone Star State.

May I not say, therefore, inasmuch as the early history of Texas is the history of the brave settlers who came there from the various States which you gentlemen represent, that, paradoxical as it may seem, the Texan, with a sincere and undivided allegiance, has a double heritage? Two countries are his; two flags are his; two glorious histories are his. He may add to the glamor of Lexington and Concord the glory of the Alamo and San Jacinto. He realizes with pride that the fires of patriotism burned in Washington, in Patrick Henry, in Israel Putnam, in Anthony Wayne, and many others who labored with them, but he knows that the cause of freedom had worthy advocates also in Austin, in Bowie, in Travis, in Lamar, in Crockett, in Houston, and the scores of others who have made glorious the pages of Texas history. In this spirit we may all be Texans on this anniversary, and in our high regard for and devotion to the cause and principles of freedom I feel sure that, in the language of the slogan of the Texans in their struggle for independence, we are all "one and indivisible." [Applause.]

RAMON RICARDO ARIAS.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution (H. J. Res. 292) providing for the admission of a young man from the Republic of Panama to the United States Military Academy at West Point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 292) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point, Ramon Ricardo Arias, a citizen of Panama.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is not this provided for in an amendment put on the Military Academy appropriation bill by the Senate?

Mr. MILLER. Not as it passed the House. I do not know what amendment was put on in the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. I think there was an amendment put on the Military Academy bill for the next fiscal year, and I was wondering if there was any reason for expedition with reference to this matter?

Mr. MILLER. In answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I will say I am informed that the last examination by which this young man can enter the academy will be held on the 16th of this month, and that is the reason for my asking unanimous consent.

Mr. KITCHIN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if this is a unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. MILLER. It is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, in his discretion, authorized to permit one Panaman student, without expense to the United States, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point; and such student, while undergoing instruction as herein authorized, shall be accorded the same privileges as are authorized by law for cadets at the Military Academy appointed from the United States.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Line 4, page 1, strike out the words "Panaman student" and insert the words "Ramon Ricardo Arias, a citizen of Panama."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

PRICES OF COMBED COTTON YARNS.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from further consideration of H. Res. 451 and for the immediate consideration of the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of H. Res. 451, and for the immediate consideration of the same. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 451.

Whereas the prices of combed cotton yarns have increased several hundred per cent during the years 1914 to 1919, inclusive, more than 100 per cent of which was during the last six months of the year 1919; and

Whereas this increase has been greatly in excess of the increase of the cost of the raw cotton and the labor entering into the manufacture of such yarns and can not therefore be attributed to such increases: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby requested to inquire into the increase in the price of combed cotton yarns during the years 1914 to 1919, inclusive, and especially during the last six months of the year 1919; to ascertain the cause or necessity for and the reasonableness of such increase; to ascertain the difference between the increase in the price of the yarn on the one hand and the increase in the cost of raw cotton and the labor entering into the cost of the manufacture of such yarn; and to report to the House at the earliest practicable date the result of the investigation, together with such recommendations as the commission may deem advisable and proper.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, lines 5 and 6, after the word "investigation," strike out the words "together with such recommendations as the commission may deem advisable and proper."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Consent has not been given.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, is this the same matter the gentleman brought up the other day?

Mr. TILSON. It is. It was objected to at that time because it had not gone to a committee. Since that time it has gone to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, a hearing has been held, and a unanimous report made by that committee recommending that the resolution be agreed to.

Mr. GARD. I note that the committee added an amendment.

Mr. TILSON. The original resolution asks for a recommendation by the Federal Trade Commission, and the committee struck out that part of it.

Mr. GARD. This limits it to the findings.

Mr. TILSON. Simply to the facts.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is sought to be accomplished by this resolution?

Mr. TILSON. Well, it will at any rate lay bare the facts in a case where it is believed there has been exorbitant prices.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will.

Mr. BEE. Can not the Federal Trade Board or one of these commissions furnish the gentleman with the information instead of having to have a resolution of Congress to secure it?

Mr. TILSON. No; it seems not. It has been the practice and it is said to be so provided in the law creating the commission that these investigations are made only by direction of one of the Houses of Congress or of a department of the Government.

Mr. BEE. I shall not object, but it seems to me that we are going far afield in investigations in this House.

Mr. TILSON. Well, that is really the purpose for which this commission was established—to make investigations—and I think this is a very proper one for the commission to make.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman will yield, first I want to ask the gentleman this: As I understand, this deals with the manufacturing end of it?

Mr. TILSON. Of cotton yarns only.

Mr. GARRETT. Now, my recollection is that the act of Congress creating our Trade Commission inhibits making public cost prices, manufacturing costs, and so on, that they may find. I may be in error about that, but I think I am correct about it. I want to ask the gentleman whether it was considered by the committee that a request from Congress to them to find these facts would justify their making it public under the law?

Mr. TILSON. The question was not raised at the hearing, and I do not know whether the committee itself considered the question in executive session.

Mr. GARRETT. I am inclined to think, I will say to the gentleman, that the resolution of the gentleman has some merit in it, but I am asking this question now as to whether or not we are going to be confronted with any legal trouble. This is a simple House resolution. Now, whether by the passage of a simple House resolution you can get the information——

Mr. TILSON. I do not believe that we can change the law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understood the gentleman to say, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE], the commission could not make this investigation unless permitted to do so by one of the Houses of Congress. Of course, under the law the commission can make the investigation if it chooses, and the only difference between making it on its own motion and making it under a resolution of one of the Houses of Congress is that the resolution gives them a standing before the Committee on Appropriations to get an appropriation which their own initiative would not give them.

Mr. TILSON. I understand that the commission raised this very question as to whether it had the authority to make this investigation without direction by the House.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They have made repeated investigations on their own initiative.

Mr. PAIGE. Will the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will.

Mr. PAIGE. What is the object of the resolution? What do you understand is to be accomplished by it?

Mr. TILSON. To show up what is believed to be one of the very worst cases of profiteering that has been known in the industries of the country.

Mr. PAIGE. Why do you not include the woolen manufacturers?

Mr. TILSON. If it were to cover too wide a territory it would require so much time that perhaps by the time it was accomplished the usefulness of it would be passed.

Mr. PAIGE. Do you not know that there has been much more increase in woolens than in cotton?

Mr. MILLER. Why do you not include boots and shoes?

Mr. TILSON. That would entirely destroy the usefulness of this particular investigation by spreading it too much.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, by whom has this profiteering been indulged in, the manufacturers of cotton yarn or the manufacturers of its fabrics?

Mr. TILSON. The manufacturers of cotton yarn, in particular.

Mr. WALSH. They have been profiteering in the manufacture of cotton yarn?

Mr. TILSON. It is a well-founded belief on the part of a great many that there has been such. If there has been, we should find it out by this investigation.

Mr. DYER. How long does the gentleman think it will take to make this investigation?

Mr. TILSON. I hope but a very short while. The quicker the better.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman knows that other resolutions have been passed here asking the Federal Trade Commission to make investigation of similar articles, boots and shoes, and other things, and that no reports have come, and it has been quite a long while since the resolutions were passed. Would it accomplish anything unless it does come promptly?

Mr. TILSON. Its usefulness will be diminished if it does not come promptly.

Mr. DYER. In what length of time?

Mr. TILSON. I should not like to commit myself to any specified time.

Mr. DYER. Six months?

Mr. TILSON. It should come in much less time than that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we ought to take up a matter of this sort on just a mere general statement from the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. It ought to come up in the regular way. We ought to have an opportunity to discuss the matter and get some information. None of us have had an opportunity, and I doubt if any of us have examined the hearings held on this resolution. I am going to object for the present.

Mr. TILSON. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this resolution, Mr. Speaker, and also embrace a part of the statement I filed with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution to the consideration of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has just objected relates to an instance of price raising so unusual and unjustifiable as to come readily within the meaning of the word "profiteering" in an industry which causes it to operate with considerable hardship upon a very large number of people.

Profiteering may be defined as the ignoble, but human, art of taking while the taking is good. Economically speaking, it is the relentless operation of the law of supply and demand when it has been disturbed in its normal course. That it has been generally practiced for the last two years—and never more than at this very hour—no one can truthfully deny. It is not confined to any country, business, trade, or profession. Everybody is doing it. Price fixing has not prevented it, and in the end only intensifies it. Instance the case of sugar. There has been an undersupply of sugar and the demand has justified economically very high prices. To the direct consumer prices were for a time restricted by governmental action, with the result that sugar was not obtainable by the direct consumer except upon conditions almost intolerable as measured in terms of inconvenience and annoyance. The supply simply went elsewhere. Since the Government has legalized profiteering in sugar to the full extent that the traffic will bear there is no further talk of a shortage and no further trouble or annoyance in procuring sugar if one has the price.

The same story, with appropriate variations, will describe many other articles of constant use entering into the economic life of the people. Some are very much more burdensome to the consuming public than sugar by reason of having to pass through a number of successive stages, and, like a rolling snowball, increasing in size with every turn.

A single instance, somewhat amplified, will serve as an illustration of what is taking place on every hand and in almost every line of business.

A few weeks ago I became convinced, upon information believed by me to be entirely reliable, that among many sinners guilty of making hay while the sun shines, the cotton-spinning industry is now probably near the head of the class and that the prices of combed yarns are the most exorbitant in that industry. I introduced a resolution requesting the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation of the combed-yarn industry, but unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution was refused in the House and it was sent to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. This committee unanimously reported the resolution favorably. In support of my resolution I collected some facts concerning high prices and profiteering which I believe will prove interesting. They are also startling when it is considered what the necessary effect of these prices is upon the price of cotton fabrics, and the further fact that this is fairly typical of what is going on in many fields of production essential to the comfort and well-being of the people.

Let me submit a table from the Textile World Journal, showing the range of prices of three sizes of combed yarns, taken semiannually, from June, 1914, to December, 1919. The three sizes are No. 40, 2 ply; No. 60, 2 ply; and No. 80, 2 ply.

Price range of combed yarns, 1914–1919.

	1914 June to December.	1915 June to December.	1916 June to December.	1917 June to December.	1918 June to December.	1919 June to December.
2-40s	$0.43–$0.38	$0.40–$0.50	$0.58–$0.85	$0.85–$0.90	$1.00–$0.95	$1.20–$2.50
2-60s	.55– .50	.52– .65	.75– 1.05	1.10– 1.15	1.25– 1.20	1.55– 3.50
2-80s	.75– .70	.72– .85	1.00– 1.25	1.40– 1.45	1.55– 1.50	2.00– 4.75

It will be observed that the increase in price of these yarns from June, 1914, to June, 1919, is somewhat gradual, but that from June, 1919, to December, 1919, there is in every case a violent jump of more than 100 per cent in the short space of six months. In the same six months raw cotton advanced only about 15 per cent and wages, the other principal item in the cost of production, not more than 15 per cent.

A hosiery manufacturer showed a few days ago a bill for No. 70, 1-ply, combed yarns, at $4 per pound. The profiteering in cotton yarns is not confined to any section of the country. It is being practiced by all textile mills and fostered by the American Spinning Association. A president of a bank made this statement the other day: "A client of our bank, owner of a spinning mill, showed me a statement for the month of January, 1920, that he made $55,000 that month on a capitalization of $200,000." The same banker reported a statement by a manufacturer made a week or so ago to the effect that a cotton mill that does not make back its investment in six months is poorly managed. He also said that prices of raw cotton are not a factor or even a consideration, because the margin of profit is so great. It is not denied that the spinners profiteered and made big money during the war, but these profits within the last six months are simply enormous.

Just one more example is given for the purpose of showing that the end is not yet.

The Old Dominion Trust Co., of Richmond, Va., sent out a circular a few days ago offering a new issue of 7½ per cent cumulative sinking-fund preferred stock in a certain North Carolina cotton mill having nearly 50,000 spindles. It is stated in the circular that for the preceding four years the average net earnings of the mill had been more than $250,000 per annum, this being two and one-half times the dividend requirements. The most interesting part of the circular is the following statement:

> Net earnings for the year 1920, based on the present cost of cotton and manufacturing, are conservatively estimated to be over $1,000,000 per annum, or over eight times the dividend requirements.
> Had the company had the benefit of the new capital now going into the treasury ($1,500,000) the earnings would have averaged $375,000 for the past four years, or three times the dividend requirements.

I quote from a newspaper article published in the center of a cotton-mill district to show the effect of the present reigning prices upon the values of cotton-mill stocks:

COTTON-MILL OWNERS BECOME MILLIONAIRES—STORIES OF HEAVY SALES AND FABULOUS DIVIDENDS BY TEXTILE PLANTS.

> Stories of fabulous prices being paid for cotton-mill stocks, of the consequent quick enrichment of the former holders, and of superdividends to shareholders in other plants have been sifting through the heavy screen of secrecy which is thrown around financial fortunes of industry and commerce. If these stories are true even in part, many men in the * * * district have jumped into the $100,000 class recently, and some have gone to the $1,000,000 mark.
> Throughout the period of the war, especially up to the last year, there was little exchange of cotton-mill stocks. Dividends hit below zero early in the struggle, struck normal after the first year or 18 months, went to attractive figures the third year. The fourth year men began to get rich.
> But it remained for the year following the war to witness the most spectacular high prices of cotton-mill stocks.

As I have said, the exorbitant prices complained of are not confined to any one section of the country. It is probably about a fifty-fifty proposition between the mills of New England and those of the South. It is possible that the mills of New England have been a little more quiet about it.

I submit here an article from the well-known and reliable Manufacturers' Record, which gives not only the cotton-mill situation in the South but also considerable light on the general situation. The article referred to in this article, written by Mr. Wade H. Harris, while too long for insertion here, is well worth reading:

THE PROSPERITY OF SOUTHERN COTTON MILLS ALMOST MATCHES THE AMAZING PROSPERITY OF ENGLISH MILLS, AND STOCK VALUES ARE ADJUSTING THEMSELVES TO THE WORLD'S ECONOMIC CONDITION.

> A safe estimate, it is believed by conservative authorities, of the increase in the value of southern cotton-mill stocks within the last 12 months is that on the average they have at least doubled in market value, thus doubling the entire investment in southern mills. In many cases mill stocks have trebled in value, and during the last three years some have done even better. But taking all mill stocks, the estimates of well-informed men is that, measuring the value of these properties by the market value of stocks, the entire industry has more than doubled in 12 months. This is based in part on the splendid earnings that have been made. But another feature of great importance is the fact that the demand for textile machinery so far exceeds the producing capacity of machinery plants that many new mills which have been projected for construction as promptly as material and equipment can be had have been unable to secure promised deliveries of machinery until 1923.

A dispatch to the Manufacturers' Record from Mr. Wade H. Harris, editor of the Charlotte Observer, whose special article in this issue on cotton-mill development is of world-wide interest, in referring to the great increase in the value of cotton-mill stocks, says: "It must be borne in mind that new mills projected have placed contracts for machinery as a general thing for delivery in 1923."

This inability of textile-machinery people to make prompt deliveries within 12 months even is a fulfillment of statements made at the World's Cotton Conference in New Orleans, when it was shown that if the world should build the mills that are needed to take care of the world's increasing cotton trade all the textile-making plants of the world would have to be crowded to their utmost capacity for the next 12 or 15 years. It is largely because present mills and the projectors of new mills are unable to make an increase in the number of spindles and looms within the next year or two that there has been given an added value to existing cotton mills.

The tremendous increase in mill stocks shown in the article by Mr. Harris is therefore due, in part, to abounding prosperity of the past few years, to the outlook for continued activity, and to the inability to increase mill capacity to any large extent inside of two or three years and likewise to the fact that mill-stock values are, in part, adjusting themselves to the cutting in two of the value of the dollar. All of these factors have contributed toward an inevitable increase in mill stocks.

The cotton-mill industry in this country and abroad is the only one, we believe, in which stock values have thus adjusted themselves to the new conditions of world-wide inflation. This inflation has been so great that the value of the dollar has been cut in half, and even to a greater extent, and there is therefore a full economic justification for an increase in profits which would meet new conditions.

The man whose income might have been, say, $10,000, from a former 6 per cent investment in a cotton mill or other property is very seriously handicapped now if his income has not increased to some extent in proportion to the doubling in the cost of living. Earnings on all the invested capital of the country, whether in farms, in mills, in furnaces, in mercantile business, are justified from every economic standpoint on a basis of at least double the amount earned in former years, for otherwise the farmer, the merchant, the manufacturer, or the investor in any of these properties would have nothing to offset the vast increase in the cost of living.

Not all industries are able to do this. The greatest investment in the country, that of about $20,000,000,000 in railroads, has been almost cut in half by the decline in railroad securities, whereas based on economic conditions and the cost of replacing the railroads, their values should have doubled. Holders of railroad securities, like the man or woman dependent on a small fixed income from investments, or the teacher or the preacher whose salaries have not been advanced, are the greatest sufferers in the country. The adjustment of their income to their pressing needs is one of the problems of the hour.

The story about the cotton-mill development of the South and the rush of New England money into the purchase of southern mill securities, published in this issue, shows some of the marvelous prosperity which exists in the cotton-mill industry and which is spreading to all lines of activity throughout the South.

I have asked for an investigation by the Federal Trade Commission because I believe that such an investigation, quickly made, covering thoroughly all the salient facts directly relating to the inordinately high prices of cotton yarns and made public at the earliest possible moment will have a salutary effect. It will, at least, help to fix public attention upon a condition that is well-nigh intolerable and one that will inevitably and for a long time increase the prices of many necessary and useful articles made from cotton yarns. These goods are already much too high in price, but of necessity must go much higher if the present prices of cotton yarns continue to prevail.

Profiteering is not an accident, neither is it simply a malevolent manifestation of sordid human nature. It can not be said to be the cause of the abnormally high cost of living, though the cause of the one furnishes opportunity for the other.

The basic cause of the high cost of living as of profiteering is that production failed for several reasons to keep pace with consumption during the war period, while at the same time great monetary inflation took place by reason of the enormous expenditures incident to the war. The former greatly contracted the supply of necessary commodities, while the latter inordinately increased the demand. The inevitable consequence is just what we see going on all around us. No law or regulation can fully control it. No governmental action can entirely prevent it. Flagrant instances of profiteering may be dealt with and the guilty parties punished, but no appreciable effect upon the cost of living can be produced by such means.

The only real remedy is to remove the cause. This can be done only by increasing the supply or by lessening the demand, or by both, which, reduced to the lowest terms, means produce more and spend less. If this principle were adopted at once and followed out individually, industrially, and in the carrying on of the Government itself, we should soon be on the high road toward a gradual recovery from the awful financial and economic debauch through which we have been passing. Meanwhile, every act or omission that restricts or curtails production and every unnecessary expenditure made, whether governmental or otherwise, will help to still further increase the cost of living and give additional opportunity for profiteering.

FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 9065.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the conference report on the bill H. R. 9065, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 9065) to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 12, 20, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have not had time to read the report, and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether there is anything in the report which amends the Federal farm loan act so as to authorize the levying of an assessment upon the Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks to pay the expenses of the Federal Farm Loan Board?

Mr. PLATT. I will say to my friend from Oklahoma that there is nothing of that kind in this bill. It is simply administrative. It takes some of the red tape out.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement was read.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9065) to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 12, 20, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 6, 7, and 8, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "and may appoint a deputy registrar who shall during the unavoidable absence or disability of the registrar perform the duties of that office"; and also by adding after "registrars," in the sixth line of said paragraph, the words "deputy registrars"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "and may appoint a deputy registrar who shall during the unavoidable absence or disability of the registrar perform the duties of that office"; also on page 1, line 13 of the engrossed bill, strike out the period and insert a comma; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

SEC. 3. That the first paragraph of section 10 be amended to read as follows:

"That whenever an application for a mortgage loan is made through a national farm loan association the loan committee provided for in section 7 of this act shall forthwith make, or cause to be made, such investigation as it may deem necessary as to the character and solvency of the applicant and the sufficiency of the security offered and cause written report to be made of the result of such investigation, and shall, if it concurs in such report, approve the same in writing. No loan shall be made unless the report is favorable, and the loan committee is unanimous in its approval thereof.

"The written report required in the preceding paragraph shall be submitted to the Federal land bank, together with the application for the loan, and the directors of said land bank shall examine said written report when they pass on the loan application which it accompanies, but they shall not be bound by said appraisal."

SEC. 4. That the third paragraph of section 11 be amended to read as follows:

"Third. To fix, under rules and regulations of the Farm Loan Board, reasonable charges to applicants for loans and to borrowers, in order to meet the necessary expenses of the association, and to acquire and dispose of such property, real and personal, as may be necessary or convenient for the transaction of its business."

Also, on page 4, line 20 of the engrossed bill, strike out "4" and insert "5."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "and inserting in lieu thereof the numeral $40"; also, on page 7, line 3 of the engrossed bill, strike out "5" and insert "6"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "$40"; also, on page 7, line 19 of the engrossed bill, strike out "6" and insert "7"; and amend the title so as to read "An act to amend certain sections of the Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

This bill, which passed the House of Representatives on September 10, 1919, and passed the Senate with amendments on January 28, 1920, has reference to administrative features of the Federal farm-loan act, and its chief purpose is to avoid delays in making loans.

The Senate's amendments Nos. 1, 2, and 3 relate to the appointment of deputy registrars in the Federal land bank districts. The bill as passed in the House provided that the registrars might name their own deputies, with the approval of the Farm Loan Board. The Senate's amendment provided for appointment by the Farm Loan Board after the disability of the registrar became known. The amendment agreed to simply authorizes the appointment of deputy registrars in each district at any time by the Farm Loan Board.

Amendment No. 4 struck out of the House bill the section which based membership in farm-loan associations on the approval of the application for a loan and inserted in lieu thereof a new section providing that the funds from which the reasonable expenses of secretary-treasurers, loan committees, and agents of the associations shall be paid may "be provided by reasonable charges, not to exceed 1 per cent of the amount borrowed, made to applicants for loans and to borrowers." To this the House conferees agreed, as these charges are and have been the ordinary means of raising the necessary fund for expenses in the associations, though without explicit authority. There is, in fact, no other way to raise the necessary funds in the associations unless the members are willing to assess themselves.

In amendment No. 5 the Senate had stricken out all of section 3 of the House bill, a section that provided that the loan committees of the farm-loan associations need not visit the lands of an applicant for a loan personally but might cause an investigation to be made "as to the character and solvency of the applicant for a loan and the sufficiency of the security offered." The managers on the part of the House felt that it was vital to have this section restored in some form, as the difficulty of getting the association loan committees to act has been a most prolific cause of delay. The section was restored with an amendment providing that all three members of a loan committee must concur in reports on loans and must approve the reports in writing.

In lieu of section 3 of the House bill the Senate had inserted a new section amending the third paragraph of section 11 of the farm-loan act, giving the farm-loan associations the authority, under rules and regulations of the Farm Loan Board, to fix reasonable charges to applicants for loans in order to meet necessary expenses. This has reference to the same matter as amendment No. 4, and the House agreed.

Amendments 6, 7, and 8 have reference to the purposes of loans made "to liquidate indebtedness of the owner of the land mortgaged," and here the Senate struck out restrictions placed in the original bill by the House. As the Farm Loan Board desired the restrictions removed and as a considerable body of opinion in the House seemed to favor their removal, the House conferees agreed.

Amendments 9 and 10 are unimportant. The House bill had stricken out the smaller bonds ($25 and $50) and the Senate inserted a $40 bond in place of them, to which the House managers agreed.

EDMUND PLATT,
L. T. MCFADDEN,
JOE H. EAGLE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up much time with this bill. It has been thoroughly explained to the House.

Mr. WINGO. In view of the remarkable answer to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] a moment ago, I would like to ask the gentleman something.

Mr. PLATT. I would be glad to answer any question that my colleague may ask.

Mr. WINGO. Here is a new matter that you put into the law. It was not in the House bill when it passed the House. I read from page 4 of the bill, Senate amendment, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the fifth paragraph of section 7 be amended by adding after the word "association," in the fourth line thereof, the words "such funds, under rules and regulations of the Farm Loan Board to be provided by reasonable charges, not to exceed 1 per cent of the amount borrowed, made to applicants for loans and to borrowers," so that said paragraph as amended will read:

"The reasonable expenses of the secretary-treasurer, the loan committee, and other officers and agents of national farm-loan associations and the salary of the secretary-treasurer shall be paid from the general funds of the association, such funds, under rules and regulations of the Farm Loan Board, to be provided by reasonable charges, not to exceed 1 per cent of the amount borrowed, made to applicants for loans and to borrowers, and the board of directors is authorized to set aside such sums as it shall deem requisite for that purpose and for other expenses of said association. When no such funds are available, the board of directors may levy an assessment on members in proportion to the amount of stock held by each, which may be repaid as soon as funds are available, or it may secure an advance from the Federal land bank of the district, to be repaid with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from dividends belonging to said association. Said Federal land bank is hereby authorized to make such advance and to deduct said repayment.

Now, that is new matter injected into the law, and matter that was not in the bill when it was considered by the House.

Mr. PLATT. Only a part of it; about four lines of it.

Mr. WINGO. Well, the proposition of levying an assessment on the borrowers is new matter.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; but the levying of an assessment on the members is in the law now.

Mr. WINGO. I know; but you can not by law assess as much as 1 per cent on the local expenses to pay the expenses of the secretary-treasurer. That is the effect of it, and that was not in the House bill when we passed it.

Mr. PLATT. No.

Mr. WINGO. And the House Committee on Banking and Currency have not approved of it.

Mr. PLATT. The conferees have approved of it.

Mr. WINGO. The House committee has not approved it.

Mr. PLATT. I know. It was not before the committee. The Federal Farm Loan Board is very anxious to have this in, and without it new farm-loan associations are practically unworkable. They have no funds, and they can not or generally will not assess themselves, and consequently there is a tendency to make no new loans, and to make it a close corporation and shut out other people. This is a small assessment of 1 per cent. It is being done now. That is the point.

Mr. WINGO. Then it is done without any authority of law.

Mr. PLATT. Without any authority of law it is being done.

Mr. WINGO. It is probably in some isolated cases where the secretary-treasurer is putting something over on the farmer. It is not authorized by law.

Now, on page 8 of the bill we undertake in the House bill to amend the provision which covered the purposes for which loans might be made. I notice in line 22 you have agreed to the Senate amendment which strikes out the words "contracted for any of the purposes enumerated in one of the subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) above. (e) To liquidate mortgage indebtedness existing at the time of the organization of the first farm-loan association established in and for the county in which the land is situated."

I am calling attention to this so that the Members of the House may understand it and gentlemen may know what I am driving at. At the bottom of page 8, in amendments 7 and 8, which the House conferees agreed to, the Senate struck this language out—"(a), (b), and (c), above."

Now, (a) is to provide for the purchase of land for agricultural purposes; (b) is to provide for the purchase of equipment, fertilizers, and live stock necessary for the proper and reasonable operation of the mortgaged farm, the term "equipment" to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board; (c) is to provide buildings and for the improvement of farm land, the term "improvement" to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Now, in amendment No. 8, which the conferees on the part of the House have agreed to, is this language, which the Senate struck out: "To liquidate mortgage indebtedness existing at the time of the organization of the first farm-loan association established in and for the county in which the land is situated."

That leaves the law, if this House adopts this conference report—does it not leave the law in this way: That a man can get a loan for the purpose of liquidating any indebtedness of the owner of the land mortgaged?

Mr. PLATT. That is true if the man is in debt.

Mr. WINGO. If he wants to buy an automobile——

Mr. PLATT. Oh, if you are going to go into the reasons why he got into debt years ago, you will throw all sorts of monkey wrenches into the operation of the machinery. It is difficult to get a man to say what he got into debt for 5 or 10 years ago. The fact is, he is in debt. Why should we ask him whether he had bought an automobile or not? A farmer has the right to buy an automobile. I do not own any myself, but I concede that the farmer may have good use for one.

Mr. WINGO. Will you yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the bill as it was originally passed by the House contains several minor amendments to the farm loan act that were threshed out by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the House approved them when they were explained to the House. When it went to the Senate, the Senate put in some new matters that the House Committee on Banking and Currency have never considered and which this House has never considered. Now, I want the Members of the House to vote with their eyes open, so that they will understand what they are doing. If you want to approve what the Senate inserted and what the House conferees have agreed to, all right; but I want you to know what it is.

The first proposition I call your attention to is that under the Senate amendment, to which the House conferees have yielded, assessments may be required by farm loan boards upon the farm loan borrowers as well as applicants of not to exceed 1 per cent, to pay the salary of their local secretary treasurer and other officers and agents of the local association. This is in addition to examination expense fee required on each application to cover expense of making loan. Now, if the gentleman will turn to page 4 of the bill he will see that not only is that permitted but the local borrowers do not control that themselves, as provided by existing law. If you want to give to the local association authority to meet an expense, it is a local corporation, and the stockholders of the local associatin are authorized to levy an assessment upon themselves without rules or regulations, without any reference to what the farm loan bank might require or what the Farm Loan Board might require; that is already the law. This is a proposal to compel them to do what is now within their own control by the board here making regulations that will make an arbitrary charge compulsory. One of the objects of the farm loan act was to relieve the farmers of this country of certain burdens, one of which was paying a local loan agent that had money for insurance, and loan companies, a commission of 1 per cent. Do gentlemen doubt if you adopt this report that the Farm Loan Board by regulation will not make this additional 1 per cent charge?

The only justification the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] offers is that they are doing it now and that the Farm Loan Board want it. What reasons have they given? You have heard the gentleman from New York admit that they have never come before the Committee on Banking and Currency and given a reason. I would like those gentlemen to come before our committee and show why they want to fasten on this system one of the evils to eradicate which the system was created, one of the evils farm borrowers in this country were suffering from. What moral effect is it going to have? It is going to encourage the local agent of the loan company to go around among the farmers, saying, "You had better keep out of this farm-loan enterprise. They can tie you up and make an assessment on you at any time during the 36 years that you have a loan. They can make an assessment of 1 per cent if they want to. You had better keep out of it."

The present law provides that the directors of the local association may levy an assessment on members in proportion to amount of stock held by each, in order to raise funds to cover expenses of local associations or pay such expenses with the dividends due local association by the land bank. The Senate amendment goes further and provides that in addition to this assessment the salaries of the officers and agents shall—not may—be paid from funds raised by a charge of not exceeding 1 per cent, made not by the borrowers by their voluntary act, but by the rules of the board here at Washington. The gentleman from New York is in error when he says the charge will be made on new applicants alone, as the amendment says "applicants for loans and borrowers."

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. WINGO. I gladly yield.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is not this the ultimate fact, that to adopt this conference report will inevitably lead to increasing the expense to which the borrower, particularly the small borrower, is subjected?

Mr. WINGO. That is the whole object of it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And is not that the inclination that we find shown in the legislation that is proposed with reference to this subject?

Mr. WINGO. Some of the gentlemen responsible for the recommendations, some members of the board, are good men, but they have not yet grasped the philosophy of the farm-loan act. They think it is a land-mortgage scheme. They want to take the lid off and to furnish the financing facilities for great plantations and farms instead of helping the small borrower and the would-be farm-home owner.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does the law limit the number of assessments that may be made on the borrower?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman heard me read it, did he not?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do not recall that part of it.

Mr. WINGO. I will read the proposed law to the gentleman:

> The reasonable expenses of the secretary-treasurer, the loan committee, and other officers and agents of national farm-loan associations and the salary of the secretary-treasurer shall be paid from the general funds of the association, such funds, under rules and regulations of the Farm Loan Board, to be provided by reasonable charges, not to exceed 1 per cent of the amount borrowed, made to applicants for loans and to borrowers, and the board of directors is authorized to set aside such sums as it shall deem requisite for that purpose and for other expenses of said association. When no such funds are available, the board of directors may levy an assessment on members in proportion to the amount of stock held by each, which may be repaid as soon as funds are available, or it may secure an advance from the Federal land bank of the district, to be repaid, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, from dividends belonging to said association. Said Federal land bank is hereby authorized to make such advance and to deduct such repayment.

If you adopt the conference report, that will be the law. It leaves that question of number of assessments open. Of course, it is intended that they shall make only one assessment, but the language permits numerous assessments if the board by rule requires it.

Mr. PLATT. The assessment is in the law now.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, you have a voluntary assessment by the local directors; that is true; but here you specifically provide for an additional assessment, not by the voluntary action of the local association, but by an arbitrary rule of a Federal board here in Washington. Let us be fair and assume that they will make only one assessment; that that is what they intend to do. If that is the law now—and the gentleman from New York admits it—then why do they want to make this additional assessment? Let us see, gentlemen, what will happen. It will be a deterrent to those who want to come in. They will say, "We do not understand this." The enemies of the system, the private loan agents who want to criticize the system, can use this as an argument and take the very language I have read here, and take the uncertainty that there will be in the law as it now reads, as I have read it to you, and they can hurt the system.

Here is my proposition: If this thing is proper, why did the Senate inject it into a bill which did not have this subject matter in it? If it is right, why did not the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] disagree to this and say, "Let the Farm Loan Board come down here before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House and show us why we should do this, and then let it be considered in a separate bill and let the House pass upon it on its merits, and not tack it as a rider on an administrative bill which the House has passed"?

I want to call attention to another thing.

Mr. PLATT. I will answer the gentleman's question if he wants me to.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will give me some more time; yes.

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman does not want his question answered, go ahead.

Mr. WINGO. Certainly I do, if the gentleman will yield me more time. Now, I want to call your attention to another matter contained in Senate amendments 7 and 8. If you adopt this conference report it will mean that a man can get the benefits of this farm loan system and get a loan—to liquidate indebtedness of the owner of the land mortgaged.

For what purpose? When we enacted the farm loan act we provided for a loan to cover the indebtedness of the owner of the land secured by an existing mortgage on the land, provided the debt had been incurred for the following purposes or any of them, to wit:

(a) To provide for the purchase of land for agricultural uses.
(b) To provide for the purchase of equipment, fertilizers, and live stock necessary for the proper and reasonable operation of the mortgaged farm; the term "equipment" to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board.
(c) To provide buildings and for the improvement of farm lands; the term "improvement" to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

But the Senate amendment cuts out these limitations. The gentleman says, "Why inquire into the purpose for which the landowner contracted his previous indebtedness?" All right. Suppose a farmer says, "I want to get an automobile. I want to go into debt for that. I want to amortize that debt under the Federal farm loan act. I want to buy a $2,000 automobile. I have a farm worth $5,000." Now, that man will go and borrow $2,000 at the bank for 90 days to buy an automobile, or he will give his note to the agent who sells him the automobile. Then he will go and file his application for a farm loan under this act "to liquidate indebtedness of the owner of the land mortgaged." He wants to pay that off and get it into an amortized loan and get it into the farm loan system, with exemption from taxation for the security. You gentlemen who are talking about exemption from taxation, if you vote for this conference report, will make it possible to amortize all nonproductive debts that improvident farmers may have incurred prior to joining the system. Let us keep this system to its original purpose to help develop the producing capacity of the farms of this country, to enable men to get farm homes, and restrict the loans to such purposes.

What justification is there for the Federal Government setting up expensive machinery to lend its aid to men to go and get loans on their land for any purpose they please? It may be to pay a poker debt, buy an automobile, or purchase oil stocks or patent rights. It may be anything of that kind, just so he owes the debt when he asks for a loan on his farm. I say, let us vote this down. I have not yet found one man who is in favor of it who was in favor of rural credits. I have not found one man in favor of these different amendments which are being urged, which destroy the very purpose of the farm loan act—I have not found one man in favor of this new scheme unless that man was originally against rural credits and sneered at our proposal and said it was a paternalistic and populistic scheme, and when the demand became so insistent they yielded and tried to kill rural credits with a "conservative" land-mortgage act. And now these same gentlemen are leaders in the efforts to weaken the present law, which was the best they would permit us to have, by putting on the borrower a load here and a load there, defeating the whole purpose, instead of devising some plan to extend the benefits of the act so as to more nearly meet the needs of the struggling farm tenant who wants to become a farm home owner. I am against the conference report. The Federal Farm Loan Board can not appear before our committee and justify either one of these two propositions. They have not tried to do it, and I challenge them to come there. I do not believe they will get the new member of the board to agree to it when once he sees their effects. Let us vote down this conference report and send it back and make the Senate recede on these three amendments. Then I am willing to give those who advocate these changes that put an additional load on the farmers and weaken the system a chance to be heard before our committee, which then can present the matter fully to the judgment of the House after mature consideration.

Private conference by certain members of the board with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] is not a committee consideration upon which the House can rely. Vote down the report. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, in regard to Senate amendment No. 4, which provides for raising funds for the farm loan association by charging not exceeding 1 per cent on applications for loans, the Federal Farm Loan Board says that is absolutely necessary to the success of the system.

It was not brought to the attention of the House committee for the reason that it has been done right along. The associations have been doing it, and they could not get along without it. About the time the House committee reported the bill somebody heard that there was no authority for this charge, and some of the secretary-treasurers began to write to the board, asking about it. The law does not provide for it, and, of course, the board had to reply that there was no authority for any charge. Commissioner Norris came down and saw the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN], ranking Democratic member of the committee, and myself, and talked it over with us and showed us the necessity for it. We decided that it ought to be done, but I told him it was too late to do anything in the House bill, and the only way was to have it put in as a Senate amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Norris raised the question two years ago, and the investigation I made shows me that in every county where I have examined it there is a rivalry between the commissioners and the banks to serve free as secretary-treasurers of the Farm Loan Association. They are anxious to give their services free.

Mr. PLATT. You take the case of a farmer who lives 5 or 10 miles away, who wants to borrow $3,000—which is about the average loan. The committee has to go out and look at the land, and how are they going to do it? There is no fund to pay for it.

Mr. WINGO. They provide for it in the existing law, and this will do away with the personal inspection.

Mr. PLATT. They have to hire an automobile to go out and look at the land, and where is the money coming from?

Mr. WINGO. They can raise it under the existing law.

Mr. PLATT. They are raising their funds now by making the charge of 1 per cent.

Mr. WINGO. They can do it under existing law.

Mr. PLATT. There is no authority in the law for it, but they have been doing it, because otherwise it is necessary to get the farmers together and assess themselves. The gentleman knows how easy it is to get farmers or any other association together to assess themselves. The result is that if this means of raising funds is not allowed the associations are likely to sit tight and shut out new borrowers.

Mr. WINGO. Why should you assess the stockholders of the corporation, against their own protest, for the benefit of an outsider? Suppose you would propose to assess the stockholders of national banks under such conditions.

Mr. PLATT. I am arguing against assessment of the stockholders. If you have no other way of raising funds than by assessment, the farm-loan association is likely to become a close corporation, letting no one else in. They will say, "Why should we let this fellow in? It will cost us $20 or $30; let him stay out and get his loan somewhere else."

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Do I understand that under this amendment we are asked to agree that an applicant for a loan is to pay an additional sum of 1 per cent after having agreed to pay so much for making the loan?

Mr. PLATT. No; that is simply a charge on them to pay the expenses of the farm-loan association for the examination of the land, salary of the secretary, and so forth.

Mr. BEE. A man borrows money from the farm-loan association at a certain specified rate of interest. Now, do I understand that this amendment compels the borrower to add 1 per cent to that sum?

Mr. PLATT. Not as interest; it is paid once for all. Suppose he is asking for a loan of $3,000, which, as I have said, is about the average loan; he will pay $30 once—nothing more.

Mr. BEE. That is in addition for the purpose of making the application?

Mr. PLATT. That is for the expense of examining the land, of looking for new members, and so forth. Somebody has got to go out and do it.

Mr. BEE. I do not know how it is in your section of the country, but from what knowledge I have in my section there has never been any practical difficulty in having the land inspected and the proper report made without putting an additional expense of $30 on the man who is borrowing $3,000. It is generally a poor man who is borrowing the money.

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman will go into his district and ask the secretaries of the farm loan associations, I think he will find that they are now doing it without authority of law, because it is the only way they can get the money.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, under the law as it exists bonds are sold for 1 per cent more than the interest rates—that is, an addition of 1 per cent.

Mr. PLATT. The interest rate on the bonds is 1 per cent less than the interest charged borrowers.

Mr. WINGO. One per cent was intended to cover the expenses?

Mr. PLATT. The expenses of the Federal land banks.

Mr. WINGO. In addition to that, do they not make a charge for inspection, and does not the language of the act with the amendments you put in specifically authorize, in addition to the regular inspection, a charge of 1 per cent for the benefit of the secretary-treasurer and bookkeeper?

Mr. PLATT. The charge for inspection—actual cost—goes to the land banks, and has nothing to do with the associations. The 1 per cent is for association expenses.

Mr. WINGO. Here is a Federal land bank owned by the association——

Mr. PLATT. I am not yielding to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. WINGO. I am asking a question.

Mr. PLATT. The Federal land bank has to send an inspector around afterwards, but the cooperative feature of the whole Federal farm-loan system is in the farm-loan association, made up of groups of farmers. They may start with 10 farmers. They get together and make application for 10 loans. After they get going the Federal land bank sends down an appraiser to appraise the land, look into the titles, and so forth, and if the loans are approved they are made. Suppose another man wants to come in and these 10 men say, "We do not want to assess ourselves for the purpose of sending somebody to look at your land. You stay out and get your money some other place." There is no reason why that man should not pay a small sum, which he pays once for all, for the privilege of joining the association and having his land appraised and the application forwarded. Under the old system he often used to pay a commission of 5 per cent, and he might have to pay it every five years, or as often as he had to renew his loan. That is one thing that we passed the farm-loan act to stop. This is a small charge, generally less than 1 per cent, paid once for all, and he gets his loan for 33 years. It has been paid right along, and so far as I know there never has been a complaint against it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Under this amendment would the money collected by this 1 per cent be used for the purpose of paying salaries, compensation, clerical help, and so on, or is there something in the law which would require that it shall be used and be used only for making this inspection, viewing the property, estimating its value?

Mr. PLATT. I will read the gentleman the section:

> The reasonable expenses of the secretary-treasurer, the loan committee, and other officers and agents of national farm-loan associations and the salary of the secretary-treasurer shall be paid from the general funds of the association.

That is the present law and is not changed. Where is the association to get any funds? If it is an old association in a rich farming country, it may receive dividends from the Federal land bank, but if it is a new association or attached to a land bank which has not yet paid dividends, it must have some way of getting funds. The only way that it can do it is either to assess its members or make a little charge on the applicants for membership who do not object to it, but who pay it once for all, for 33 years.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Then the money arising out of this 1 per cent can be used for paying the salaries of the officers?

Mr. PLATT. Yes. Officers of the cooperative association.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. And there is nothing to prevent them pursuing the policy the gentleman says they now pursue without authority of law—of making an assessment to cover the expense of the inspection of the property.

Mr. PLATT. There is no authority for the charge now, and if the law were strictly followed the members would have to be asssessed to provide funds.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Do I understand that this 1 per cent is not to be exclusively used for the purpose of inspection of the property?

Mr. PLATT. No; not exclusively. It provides for general expenses of the associations. There is nothing new in this except the authority for the levying of the 1 per cent. As it stands now, they can assess their members.

Mr. BEE. I understand that.

Mr. PLATT. Or use their dividends, if they have any.

Mr. BEE. Here is what is in my mind. If you are to assess a man for the purposes indicated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], of paying the expenses of the inspection, it ought to be so worded as to make it not to exceed a certain amount, because it might cost a few dollars to inspect one piece of property, while it might cost $50 to inspect another piece of property, and you make the man making the loan on the piece of property which it is inexpensive to inspect pay just as much as the man whose inspection will cost $50.

Mr. PLATT. If you are going into that, it costs a great deal more in proportion to inspect a small piece of property, a small farm, than it does to inspect a large farm.

Mr. BEE. I am not speaking of the small ones or the large ones. Let me ask the gentleman this further question: How long has this been going on—making these loans?

Mr. PLATT. The act was passed July 17, 1916, and the Federal land banks were organized in the spring of 1917.

Mr. BEE. Has it not been a marked success, growing in volume and force?

Mr. PLATT. A very marked success. The capital stock of the Federal land bank is growing at the rate of $500,000 a month, and the assets are increasing some sixteen or eighteen millions a month.

Mr. BEE. Is it necessary to put this additional burden of 1 per cent on the people who are borrowing the money?

Mr. PLATT. I think it is necessary, and the board says it is essential. It is not an additional burden, but has been generally charged, though without authority, because there was no other practicable way of raising necessary funds.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. Is it not true that the local organizations, where they desire to, now, by mutual agreement, pay their secretaries a salary?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; as a rule, a small salary.

Mr. TINCHER. Is not this amendment the result of a propaganda of the local secretaries, who want to be put on a salary themselves?

Mr. PLATT. I have not heard a word from them in favor of this. It is the Federal Farm Loan Board that declares that it is necessary.

Mr. TINCHER. This will have the result of putting all the local secretaries on a salary, whereas, as a matter of fact, a great many are now serving without compensation.

Mr. PLATT. A good many of them are bank officers in commercial banks, and they serve for the purpose of getting the deposits.

Mr. TINCHER. Is there any complaint from any local organization indicating that they can not successfully operate without this amendment?

Mr. PLATT. The Farm Loan Board stated that unless this language is incorporated a good many associations would stop and will not make any more loans. They will say, "Why should we assess ourselves to take in new members who are making us extra expense, perhaps for viewing property 10 miles away?"

Mr. TINCHER. There is nothing to hinder that man from paying for an examination of his property.

Mr. PLATT. There is if we do not pass this.

Mr. TINCHER. That is the meat of the whole proposition. If a man is willing to pay for this inspection, then he could go into the association, unless the secretary was demanding a salary.

Mr. PLATT. It is not the secretary. That salary is wholly within the power of the association. They do not have to pay him a salary if they do not want to; but they can not run, or, at least, they can not grow and secure new members and new loans without incurring some expenses.

Mr. TINCHER. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that some secretaries have argued prior to this time that they should get a larger salary, and it has been the policy of the banks to try to encourage the local association to pay their secretaries a salary?

Mr. PLATT. I think it is very likely, because the land banks want to get men who will attend to the business. The secretary-treasurers have considerable to do. They have to collect the interest and amortization payments and forward them to the land banks.

Mr. TINCHER. They want to get the best clerical force they can, and inasmuch as the farmer pays part of the money, they have adopted the policy of trying to get each local organization to get its secretary on a salary. Does the farmer get any benefit from it? Is it not for the convenience of the bank that gets the difference between what the farmer pays and the loan price?

Mr. PLATT. The farmer, already in an association, perhaps gets no benefit from letting in new borrowers. That is the reason for this amendment. It is a question of whether you want to stop the associations from going on. If you will examine this question with the Farm Loan Board you will find they are having the greatest trouble in getting reports from farm loan associations. The associations must have secretary-treasurers who know their business. Some farm loan associations carry on their affairs very well. There is one in Senator GRONNA's district. Senator GRONNA was a conferee and was very strongly in favor of having this put in; but a great many of their secretary-treasurers do not get a salary large enough to warrant spending much time on their work, and they do not care whether they make new loans or not, and they do not make reports. The growth of each association depends largely on the secretary-treasurer.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not exactly get the point of view of the 1 per cent business. On page 2 of your report here you fix section 4 as amended to read:

To fix, under rules and regulations of the Farm Loan Board, reasonable charges to applicants for loans and to borrowers.

And so forth.

Now, where is the limit of 1 per cent? Gentlemen have been talking about 1 per cent here, and I do not see any limitation in reference to that.

Mr. PLATT (reading):

Such funds under rules and regulations of the Farm Loan Board to be provided by reasonable charges, not to exceed 1 per cent.

Mr. STEVENSON. Here you have in italics—

Not exceeding 1 per cent.

Mr. PLATT. One clause gives the Farm Loan Board authority, and the other the farm loan association.

Mr. STEVENSON. The conference report, though, says that in lieu of the matter proposed in the Senate amendment insert the following and——

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman is looking at another amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. He is looking on page 6 and the gentleman is talking about an amendment on page 4.

Mr. STEVENSON. Page 2 in your report provides that section 4 shall read that way. Now, on page 5 of the Senate bill in section 4 the conferees provide for levying a charge for administration at a rate not exceeding 1 per cent. As I understand that, that is all stricken out, and the language of page 2 of that report is to take the place of that.

Mr. PLATT. No. The gentleman is mistaken. There was a section in there that referred to a charge, but only gave the board authority to make rules to provide for a charge. The other provides the charge shall not be above 1 per cent.

Mr. STEVENSON. Has this bill been printed with the Senate amendments shown?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have not been able to get a copy of that, and therefore I am entirely unprepared to deal with the question.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. CANDLER. Is this 1 per cent intended to be expended in the inspection of land that is tendered by the borrower for the purpose of securing the loan?

Mr. PLATT. That is the chief expense of it. It provides a fund for the farm-loan association, from which its expenses are paid.

Mr. CANDLER. Heretofore these investigations have been made by three local inspectors appointed by the local board?

Mr. PLATT. The local loan committee; yes.

Mr. CANDLER. And the borrower pays the expenses of those three inspectors when they have to go and examine the land?

Mr. PLATT. They pay whatever expenses they may incur; they might have to hire an automobile; but not exceeding 1 per cent.

Mr. CANDLER. The only suggestion I have had in reference to that is that instead of having three to make these investigations it would be economy to provide one man.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; exactly what we are doing by this bill. We have stricken out the reference to three men to go and view the land, which the law now requires, and we fix it so that they can cause the investigation to be made——

Mr. CANDLER. By one man?

Mr. PLATT. To be made by one man. The present requirement that the members of the loan committee of three should all view the land is a most prolific source of delay. Mr. Lever, whom we all know, long a Member of this House and former chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, told me that it caused a delay of five months in the approval of an application for a loan in his former district—the difficulty of getting the committee together and having all three go and view the land. Now, we provide in this bill that all three must sign the report, but they do not have to go to appraise the land themselves. They can send somebody, or one can go, and that will reduce the expense considerably and reduce the delays greatly.

Mr. CANDLER. That would be paid out of the 1 per cent. Where does that 1 per cent come from now that you have utilized heretofore?

Mr. PLATT. Simply a little commission of 1 per cent, probably less in most cases, charged to the applicant for the loan.

I want to answer a matter propounded by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] in regard to the purpose of the loans. We have liberalized the law a little bit at the suggestion of the Farm Loan Board.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. This amendment permitting the issue of 1 per cent was added in the conference committee?

Mr. PLATT. In the Senate.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. And it was not considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. PLATT. Not by the House committee. It was not brought to our attention until after we had reported the bill out.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. When did the Farm Loan Board make their recommendation for this 1 per cent?

Mr. PLATT. They made it to the Senate committee just after we had completed the bill.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Do you not think those matters ought to be brought before the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. PLATT. The Senate has a Banking Committee just as able, I think, as ours.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Do you not think if we are going to pass on it that we ought to have a chance to consider it?

Mr. PLATT. Our conferees considered it, and I consulted with other members of the committee.

Mr. CARTER. Of course, the gentleman knows that you do not get the careful consideration in a conference committee which a committee having more time and which is not under pressure can give it. I think there is much in what the gentleman said. What I want to ask is this: I have never gotten it straight in my head yet, exactly, how this secretary and treasurer's salary and expenses are paid now, and how the expenses of other officers and agents of these farm associations are paid now.

Mr. PLATT. They are charging the applicant for a loan a little commission—half of 1 per cent, or 1 per cent.

Mr. CARTER. With his consent?

Mr. PLATT. With his consent.

Mr. CARTER. Why the necessity of making a mandatory legal provision?

Mr. PLATT. We are not making it mandatory, but are authorizing it. The law does not provide for it now, but they have been making it as a matter of necessity. Recently some have been writing in to the board asking if they can do it. The only thing the board can do is to tell them they can not do it as the law now stands.

Mr. CARTER. Did the gentleman know of these existing conditions when this bill came before the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. PLATT. Not at the time it came before the committee, but just after we reported it, and Commissioner Norris came in to see Mr. Phelan and myself, and we talked this matter over and agreed that an arrangement of this kind ought to be made. My recollection is that I suggested that it be put in as an amendment in the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. I will tell the gentleman what it looks like on the face of it to a man who has not given it any study. It looks like, in authorizing the charge of 1 per cent additional to the farmer, something like the charge in some of the Western States of a commission of 1 or 2 per cent on loans that are made by people who handle the loans for other people.

Mr. PLATT. They charge a great deal larger per cent.

Mr. CARTER. In some instances, and in some instances 1 per cent only.

Mr. PLATT. And the loans are made only for five years or less, and when they expire they have to pay another commission.

Mr. CARTER. They make a loan for 10 years now.

Mr. PLATT. These loans are made for 30 years, and the charge is infinitesimal.

Mr. CARTER. It has to be 1 per cent. That is not infinitesimal.

Mr. PLATT. It does not have to be anything at all, but if made, under the rules and regulations of the Farm Loan Board, can not exceed 1 per cent. And the board says if they stop the secretary-treasurer from doing this the act becomes unworkable.

Mr. CARTER. It is not unreasonable to expect they are going to do that.

Mr. PLATT. They will not assess themselves, as a rule.

Mr. CARTER. In the other way you make it mandatory.

Mr. PLATT. If you vote down this report assessments will become mandatory.

Mr. CANDLER. If it has worked well up to the present time, which it seems to me to have done, why the necessity of making the change now?

Mr. PLATT. Do you not see that the system has worked well because the associations have been acting without authority of law? When they write to the board and ask them about this charge, the board has to tell them they can not do it.

Mr. CANDLER. They have had some funds before, and it has been successful up to the present time.

Mr. PLATT. They have obtained the funds in this way because there was no other workable way to obtain them. Did you ever hear of any kind of an association that assessed members already in to pay the expenses of a new member, letting the new member in free?

Mr. CARTER. Can the gentleman give us any information as to how much profit has been made by the farm loan banks themselves?

Mr. PLATT. The Federal land banks, taken as a whole, have made profits or net earnings up to January 31 last of a couple of million dollars, I think, and have got undivided profits of about $800,000, if I remember, and have paid dividends of about $682,000. Now, some of them are paying dividends to the farm loan associations, and when your association is getting dividends it does not have to charge new members. But as to a new association, without dividends, or an association in a district not yet paying dividends, how is it going to raise money?

Mr. CARTER. What is this money used for?

Mr. PLATT. To pay the expenses of the association, inspecting the land, and paying the secretary-treasurer a salary.

Mr. CARTER. What is the surplus used for?

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman refers to the surplus of the land banks, for paying dividends to the farm loan associations or for strengthening the security back of the bonds. That is all right. But a new association not receiving dividends has got to get funds somewhere. The Federal board has to make regulations, and it is certainly composed of men who are looking after the interests of the system and are trying to make it grow.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman give me a little time?

Mr. PLATT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I think we should be very careful about amending the Federal land bank act, and especially by amendment that will increase the expenses of the farm loan associations.

There were many Members, when this bill passed Congress, who felt that the farm loan associations ought not to be allowed to employ a salaried secretary-treasurer, because it would add that much to the administrative expenses of the borrower. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] asked how much profit these Federal land banks had made. Now, the fact is—and I wish every Member of this House would get that in mind—the Federal land banks can not make a profit. They are not profit-sharing institutions. They are allowed not to exceed 1 per cent for administration expenses, but the law assumes that the 1 per cent will not be charged unless it is necessary, and the idea is that when 1 per cent is charged and it is found that it is not needed for the economical administration of the banks, then the surplus shall go back to the borrowers in the form of dividends. Whatever goes back to borrowers in this way represents an overcharge and not a profit. These banks have no money except what the borrowers pay into them. These banks borrow money on the sale of the bonds. The bonds bear 4½ per cent interest. The banks loan this money at 5½ per cent interest. The banks should do business on one-half of 1 per cent, but it matters not how large a surplus one of these banks may have; it does not represent a profit; it indicates that the banks had made excessive interest charges and that they ought to reduce the interest rate. [Applause.]

Now, when you allow these local associations to employ high-salaried secretary-treasurers and authorize them to charge borrowers an additional commission of 1 per cent you have added that much to the cost of their loans, and when you give them authority to levy 1 per cent on the face of a loan, $30 on a $3,000 loan, you are simply adding that much. The future success of these Federal land banks depends on economical administration, and the more you extend this association in its power, in its expense for officers, the more of a burden you are adding to the borrower, because the borrower pays every cent of that cost from that local organization up to the Federal land bank.

Now, the Committee on Banking and Currency ought not to bring in here bills making fundamental changes, increasing the expenses upon the borrower, except in cases where we can have ample opportunity to discuss the question, which we do not have on a conference report.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. Under this provision if a man wanted to borrow $1,000 or $2,000 or $3,000 they would employ two or three inspectors at $1.50 or $2.50, which would amount to $4, $5, or $6. This would increase to that extent the cost of making a loan, and all of that expense falls on the borrower. Under this proposed provision if the loan was for $1,000 it would cost $10, and if it were for $2,000 it would cost $20, and if it were $3,000 it would cost $30.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; and they could use this 1 per cent to pay the expenses of the secretary-treasurer and other expenses of the local association, and it simply gives a few men there a chance to add to their salaries and income.

Mr. CANDLER. And put the expense on the borrower?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. There has been no trouble in the past in regard to these new associations. They have gotten along all right.

Mr. PLATT. But they have been doing just this.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. These associations are under the control of the Federal Farm Loan Board. It is asserted that the Farm Loan Board has been permitting the local associations to levy charges on borrowers that are unauthorized under the law. And if that be true, they have failed to do their duty and their advice should not be followed by this House. Why do members of the Farm Loan Board permit associations to go on and violate the law and make assessments that the law does not authorize?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a word in answer to some of these questions. I gave the impression a few moments ago, perhaps, that all the Federal land banks were paying dividends. Of course, that is not true of all of them. The big land banks in Spokane and Omaha and St. Paul and down in Texas are paying dividends, but the eastern banks are not; those in my district are not paying dividends. The only way they can raise funds to pay the secretary-treasurer is by an assessment upon the borrowers or by an assessment on the members, and you know how hard it is to levy an assessment on the members until they get well started. They will not do it. This charge of a small commission has been made since the system started. If somebody can suggest some other way to raise funds, all right. The law allows them to assess themselves, but that is a cumbersome, difficult thing to do. Members of associations naturally do not assess themselves to pay the expenses of taking in new members. The universal rule is to make the new members pay something for their new privileges.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 56.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the adoption of the conference report will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 206, answered "present" 2, not voting 115, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BACHARACH). On this vote the yeas are 104, the nays are 206. A quorum is present; the conference report is not agreed to. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and ask for a further conference.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] is entitled to the floor, the conference report having been rejected.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman from New York will ask that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments and ask for a further conference, I am perfectly willing that he should do that.

Mr. PLATT. I think that is what I did ask.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas has control of this thing now.

Mr. PLATT. Gentlemen on this side of the House seem to like to follow the gentleman from Arkansas on this matter. I am perfectly willing——

Mr. WINGO. Very well, Mr. Speaker. I move, as I have a right to under the rule, that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments and ask for a further conference.

Mr. PLATT. That is exactly what my request was.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but the gentleman from Arkansas has the right to make the motion and has control of it from now on until he gets beaten on what he suggests. I simply want the precedents of the House preserved.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] was not a conferee.

Mr. WINGO. Certainly I was not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Arkansas was the chief opponent of this conference report.

Mr. GOOD. Certainly the gentleman from New York, who is chairman of the committee, is entitled to recognition to make the motion that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments and ask for a further conference.

Mr. WINGO. The precedents are against the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know exactly how long the gentleman from Iowa has been here, but I will tell him what happened one day when I was Speaker——

[The SPEAKER resumed the chair.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I am insisting on is that the Chair has no right to recognize the gentleman from New York; that the gentleman from Arkansas opposed this thing and led the opposition and came out on top; and that being so, is entitled to control this thing.

The SPEAKER. The authorities are the other way as to conference reports.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are bad authorities, then. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair cites section 6525 of Hinds' Precedents:

The rejection of a conference report leaves the matter in the position it occupied before the conference was asked. * * * The minority have no special privileges as to asking conferences.

Mr. GARRETT. But, Mr. Speaker, this it not the minority. This is the majority asking for recognition—the majority on this vote.

The SPEAKER. In the case cited a conference report was voted down, and Mr. Bland demanded recognition. The Chair refused to recognize him, holding that the rejection of the report left the bill and amendments in the same position as when the conference was asked and ordered, and that the ordinary rule as to control and recognition did not apply to conference reports. The Chair thinks the chairman of the committee [Mr. PLATT] still has the right to recognition.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and ask for a further conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House Mr. PLATT, Mr. MCFADDEN, and Mr. EAGLE.

Mr. WINGO. I suggest that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] is not in the city, and has gone home, and possibly will be delayed.

Mr. PLATT. I think the gentleman from Texas has only gone for a day or two.

Mr. PARRISH. The gentleman from Texas has gone for about 8 or 10 days.

Mr. PLATT. Then, I ask to have Mr. PHELAN named as conferee.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] will act as the third conferee on the part of the House.

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. WOOD of Indiana, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, H. R. 12610, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce: Director, $6,000; assistant directors—1 $3,500, 1 $3,000; private secretary, $1,800; 4 chiefs of divisions, at $2,500 each; assistant chief of division, $2,250; chief clerk, $2,250; expert on commerce and finance, $2,000; commercial economist, $2,750; chief of sections—1 $2,500, 1 $2,000; translators—1 $2,000, 1 $1,800, 2 at $1,400 each; editorial assistant, $2,000; clerks—12 of class 4, 6 of class 3, 18 of class 2, 18 of class 1, 20 at $1,000 each, 14 at $900 each; messenger; 4 assistant messengers; laborer; 2 messenger boys, at $420 each; in all, $162,470.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. WOOD of Indiana] to agree that we may pass this item for the present. It will be my purpose to offer to restore the commercial attachés and to restore the number of commercial agents who have been cut out of the bill. When that is done, of course, this item will have to be increased so as to take care of the clerical force in this bureau. In the event that the amendments I offer are voted down, this item ought not to be increased. Of course, if that can not be agreed to, then, in order to save my rights on the bill, I will be compelled to offer an amendment now to restore the current law in this item; but by passing it we can then go to the point where the real controversy hinges, and in the event that we are not successful this item ought to remain at its present figure.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will say that I intended to offer the amendment restoring the commercial attachés, as provided in the last appropriation bill.

Mr. SISSON. I suppose, as a member of the committee, I would have the right to recognition to offer that amendment.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Why not go ahead with the question right now?

Mr. SISSON. It is my intention to offer an amendment at the proper place; but in view of the fact that if I offer to substitute the current law at this time it will necessarily involve a discussion of amendments not now before the committee, I ask unanimous consent, in order that we may have orderly procedure, that this item be passed over so that I may offer the amendment at the proper place. If this is agreed to I will say that it is my purpose to offer at this section an amendment to restore the commercial attachés.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have no objection whatever to passing this item at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that this paragraph be passed over without prejudice for the present.

Mr. VARE. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. In consenting to this I wish to reserve all points of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be understood.

Mr. VARE. I want to say that I have an amendment prepared to increase the employees in this section.

Mr. SISSON. I have the data now, and I expect to offer the amendment. I will state that if this unanimous consent is agreed to I will immediately offer the current law as to commercial attachés.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. What is to be gained by passing this now; we have a very good attendance. Does the gentleman think there will be less discussion later?

Mr. SISSON. No; but if the paragraph with reference to attachés is restored you will have to increase the clerk hire provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. WALSH. Why not determine that now?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This paragraph relates only to the clerical office force in Washington. The gentleman from Mississippi desires to take up the major question first.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SISSON: Page 127, after line 21, insert the following:

"Commercial attachés: For commercial attachés, to be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce, after examination to be held under his direction to determine their competency, and to be accredited through the State Department, whose duties shall be to investigate and report upon such conditions in the manufacturing industries and trade of foreign countries as may be of interest to the United States; and for one clerk to each of said commercial attachés to be paid a salary not to exceed $1,500 each and for necessary traveling and subsistence expenses of officers, rent outside of the District of Columbia, purchase of reports, books of reference, and periodicals, travel to and from the United States, exchange on official checks, and all other necessary expenses not included in the foregoing; such commercial attachés shall serve directly under the Secretary of Commerce and shall report directly to him, $165,000."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not authorized by law and is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, it is our contention that under the act creating the Department of Commerce, these powers were granted the Commerce Department, as such promoting the development of foreign and domestic commerce. Section 670 of that act, under the head of "Powers and duties of the department," reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That is shall be the province and duty of said department to foster, promote, and develop the foreign and domestic commerce, the mining, manufacturing, shipping, and fishery industries, the labor interests, and the transportation facilities of the United States; and to this end it shall be vested with jurisdiction and control of the departments, bureaus, offices, and branches of the public service hereinafter specified, and with such other powers and duties as may be prescribed by law.

Now, when this bureau was created the Department of Commerce had in it the Department of Labor. The act which separated the Department of Labor from the Department of Commerce left the Department of Commerce with all powers over commerce enumerated in this act.

Under that very broad language—to cause the promotion of commerce—if you take the technical definition of the word "promote," it means "to reach a certain desired end, to contribute to the development, the establishment, the increase or the influence, to foster and further, to forward and encourage or advance or promote business." Under that language it is our contention that Congress has the right, if in its judgment it becomes necessary, to create, as we attempt to do in this case, and as has been carried in the bill for several years, an item in reference to the commercial attachés. The only question is, Does it promote, further, advance, and so forth, commerce? If it does do that, it is our contention that the organic act creating the Department of Commerce vested that department with the authority to do these things necessary to promote commerce with foreign countries and foreign nations.

On that theory, as I understand it, legislation has been carried heretofore. This is the first time that this item has been stricken from the bill by the committee. If our contention is true, this language is broad enough to cover not only the commercial attachés but the commercial agents, and so on. Because if the Chair should hold that this is not in order, the commercial agents are not in order, and you would have a Secretary of Commerce with a lot of clerks in Washington without having anything to do in relation to the real purpose for which the department was created.

Therefore, if in the judgment of Congress it is necessary to promote foreign commerce and foreign trade by commercial attachés, Congress has that right under this legislation.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time that this question has been raised in reference to foreign attachés. It was attempted in the Sixty-third Congress to make an appropriation for the same purpose. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], I think, was in the chair. The point was raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] that there was no law authorizing or warranting these foreign attachés, that it was legislation on an appropriation bill and involved an expenditure. The point of order was conceded at that time.

Now, there is no law creating foreign attachés. The law creating the Department of Commerce was taken from the law creating the Bureau of Manufactures and Statistics in the Department of Labor.

All of the law for the regulation of the Department of Commerce, in so far as its foreign relations are concerned, is embodied in the organic act which previously placed these duties with the Bureau of Manufactures and Statistics in the Labor Department. I call the attention of the Chair to what the law is, which was referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] in the paragraph he read with reference to the creation of the Bureau of Commerce:

> And all consular officers of the United States, including consuls general, consuls, and commercial agents, are hereby required, and it is made a part of their duty under the direction of the Secretary of State, to gather and compile from time to time useful and material information and statistics in respect to the subjects enumerated in section 3 of this act, in the countries and places to which such consular officers are accredited, and to send under the direction of the Secretary of State reports as often as required by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor—

And so forth.

The commercial attaché is a growth. There is not one word in the law giving any recognition to any such office or to any such officers. It is one of the evolutions that have occurred in the expansion of this foreign service in the Department of Commerce. In the first place, they had commercial agents, afterwards commercial commissioners, resident and roaming, and a few years ago they attempted to create this new office and proposed it in the Sixty-third Congress. A point of order was raised against it, and it was conceded that it was out of order. There has been no organic law passed by this Congress since that time. It was out of order at that time, and it is out of order now, because there is absolutely no warrant of law for a commercial attaché.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is true, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has stated, that the law does not expressly provide for the appointment of commercial attachés, but I insist that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is entirely correct in his argument that under the broad powers given to the Department of Commerce, under its organic act, clearly Congress has the authority to provide that department with the machinery necessary to perform the duties set forth in the act. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has stated that on a previous occasion a point of order was made to this same provision. I do not recall the exact facts connected with the matter at that time. That was back in 1912 or 1913, if I mistake not. A point of order was made. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] was in the chair.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] raised the point of order. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was in the chair, and the gentleman from Tennessee conceded that it was well taken.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Which gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman who is now addressing the Chair.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, I think the gentleman will find, if he will look into the RECORD, that he is mistaken as to that.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. GARNER was in the chair, and the gentleman from Tennessee conceded the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not clearly recall the matter, but I think the gentleman must be mistaken as to that. My memory, however, may be at fault. The gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Johnson, was chairman of the legislative, executive, and judicial subcommittee at that time and in charge of the bill on the floor. If any concession was made, it more probably would have been made by the gentleman from South Carolina rather than by me; but, however that may be, the point I am making is this: This matter was not deliberately passed on at that time. I do not know what was in the mind of the gentleman making the concession, whether he was convinced that the point of order was well taken or whether he was anxious to speed his bill, but the matter was not argued at length and not carefully considered by the Chair, since no opinion was rendered. Hence the action of the Chairman at that time constitutes no precedent at this time.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] referred to the organic act, section 3, and if the Chair will pardon me I will read it again, because it is broad and, it seems to me, would authorize Congress to make any appropriation or provide for any officials necessary to carry out its purposes. I read:

> That it shall be within the province and duties of said department to foster, promote, and develop foreign and domestic commerce, mining, manufacturing, shipping, the labor interests, and the transportation facilities of the United States—

And so forth.

I submit, if Congress has not the power to provide employees for the Department of Commerce to promote our foreign commerce, to secure necessary information in those countries where our commerce may find a market and where our manufacturers can do business, then that department will be unable to carry out the duties prescribed in this act and intended by the Congress.

The gentleman from Indiana has referred to another provision of this act directing the Consular Service to furnish information through the Secretary of State to the Secretary of Commerce. That section reads:

> A person to be designated by the Secretary of State shall be appointed to formulate under his direction for the instruction of consular officers the requests of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and to prepare from the dispatches of the consular officers for transmission to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor such information as pertains to the work of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

But, Mr. Chairman, neither by direction nor by implication does that say that Congress shall not have the power to give to the Department of Commerce other avenues of information and other methods of carrying out the work prescribed for it in the organic act. It was simply an additional means and an additional facility given to the Department of Commerce to secure information from consular agents as well as through other machinery provided by Congress. I respectfully submit that under the broad terms of this organic act Congress has the authority to provide proper agents of that department to secure information and to assist in promoting and developing foreign commerce. It does not matter whether you call them commercial attachés or trade commissioners or commercial agents. The name signifies nothing. It is the duty to be performed by these officials, regardless of the name that may be given.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. As I understand the gentleman's position, it is that the power of this law is unlimited; that the Department of Commerce has the right to do anything which might fairly be construed within this general provision.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, no; my position is this: That the Congress has the authority to provide the machinery necessary to carry out the terms of that act. Of course the Department of Commerce is limited to such authority as may be given it by the Congress.

Mr. DENISON. Suppose the Committee on Appropriations without any further legislation should bring in a provision here establishing branches of the Department of Commerce in various capitals in Europe and making appropriation for carrying out that work. Would that be in order, if the point of order should be made?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman says establish branches of the Department of Commerce?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know that Congress would have the authority under existing legislation to establish a branch of the Department of Commerce in the capitals of Europe in an appropriation act, unless what the gentleman calls branches of the department would be the location of agents there who would be expected to collect information and furnish it to the Department of Commerce. If that is what the gentleman means by branches of the Department of Commerce, I think clearly Congress would have that right.

Mr. DENISON. Without any additional legislation?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Then, I take it, that it is the position of the gentleman that under this organic act and the power going from it that Congress through an appropriation act has the right to pass any kind of legislation which has for its effect the promotion of the commerce of the United States?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Absolutely——

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And needs no substantive law aside from the organic act?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The organic act directly places upon the Department of Commerce the duty of fostering, developing, and promoting our foreign commerce, and the gentleman well knows that unless the Department of Commerce is provided with the proper machinery it can not perform the function which Congress in passing the act expected that it would do.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does the gentleman contend this work can only be done through an appointee or agent of the Department of Commerce; that it can not be done through an agent or appointee of the Department of State?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, for a long time, ever since the establishment of our Consular Service, the consuls have had, among their other duties, that of promoting our commerce, looking after the commercial interest of the United States and its citizens. This act was passed, and I do not mean to intimate that it repeals or undertook to take from the Department of State the right which it heretofore enjoyed in that respect, but what I do insist upon is this: That Congress in creating the Department of Commerce intended that the department should be charged with this responsibility, and in order to perform that responsibility it must necessarily have its agents located in foreign countries.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So if this appropriation bill came in here it could provide for 10 commercial attachés at $50,000 each?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think there is the slightest question about that. Of course, it is a question with the Congress, after all, as to the number of agents and what salaries they shall be paid.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, carrying out the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] to its logical conclusion, and I guess he has admitted it, under the organic act creating the Department of Commerce, with reference to its foreign relations, we could establish an ambassador, minister plenipotentiary and extraordinary, and that there would be no possible limit upon the authority of the Department of Commerce under this act. Unfortunately for the gentleman the act does limit its authority. It limits it in its activities, so far as appointments are concerned, to those that are prescribed by law. Do not make any mistake about that. I call the attention of the gentleman to paragraph 856, in which they define the powers and duties of the department, and so forth, and say:

> That it shall be the province and duty of said department to foster, promote, and develop the foreign and domestic commerce, the mining, manufacturing, shipping, and fishery industries, the labor interests, and the transportation facilities of the United States; and to this end it shall be vested with jurisdiction and control of the departments, bureaus, offices, and branches of the public service hereinafter specified, and with such other powers and duties as may be prescribed by law.

Now, then, it took from the Bureau of Manufactures and Statistics in the Department of Labor this activity, and it is the only power it has by prescribed law which is referred to in this paragraph to conduct this activity at all. Now, that being true, we must look to the law prescribed for their conduct, as it is here stated it must be prescribed for their conduct, and see what their limitations are and what their privileges are.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman recall the decisions made when the Agricultural appropriation bill has been before the House construing the language which is very similar to that which the gentleman has just read?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I do not.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I will say to the gentleman, if I recall correctly, the uniform construction for many years has been that the expression "as may be prescribed by law," as contained in the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture, has been held to mean that upon an appropriation bill Congress could either make the law—and now I want to be perfectly frank with the gentleman, whether the distinction was made by these rulings—and I would be glad for the Chair to hear me just now upon this—whether the distinction was made by these rulings upon the fact that the Committee on Agriculture was both a legislative and an appropriating committee I am not prepared at this time to state. Certainly it was held uniformly for years when the Agricultural bill was under consideration that the expression, which I remember was in the same terms as used here, namely, "as prescribed by law," authorized the Committee on Agriculture to provide for positions under that department, and naturally rendered it in order for an amendment to be offered from the floor of the House to that effect.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am not familiar with the decisions the gentleman refers to or the rulings, but I apprehend even in that case, if it should prove an exception, it would be primarily for the reason that the Agriculture Committee has original jurisdiction over agricultural affairs and then also has original jurisdiction with reference to appropriations. It has complete jurisdiction of the two and has authority to legislate, which the Appropriations Committee has not.

Mr. DENISON. It has authority to legislate.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is a legislative committee. This is legislation upon an appropriation bill and it was admitted to be legislation. The same amendment that is now proposed reads exactly like that amendment proposed in the Sixty-third Congress, only different as to the amount that is proposed.

I desire to call attention to what was said on that occasion:

> The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] insist upon his point of order?
> Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, this section confers upon the Secretary of Commerce——

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask the gentleman from Indiana what he is reading from?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 51, Part VII, Sixty-third Congress, second session, of April 14, 1914.

I will read further:

> This section confers upon the Secretary of Commerce the right to appoint an indefinite number of commercial agents or attachés. It also requires that the attachés or agents so appointed shall be accredited by the State Department, and it also provides that they shall report directly to the Secretary of Commerce. Now, this is clearly new legislation.
>
> Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We admit that.
> Mr. RAINEY. The act creating the Department of Commerce does not authorize the creation of new consular agents in a new manner, but it simply authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to collect commercial data at home and abroad in various ways and through our commercial agents abroad. But our commercial agents and attachés abroad are required by the act to report directly to the Secretary of State, and through the Secretary of State the reports may be transmitted to the Secretary of Commerce. This is clearly new legislation, and it is contrary to the existing law. I am compelled to make the point of order.

I desire to further emphasize the fact that under this new legislation they are proposing to establish a new method whereby the reports of the activities of these agents abroad shall be transmitted to the Government—not to the Secretary of State, as the organic law which provides for all this commercial work requires it shall be done. The only law which gives to this branch of the Government a right to function requires that all these reports shall be submitted to the State Department. But they are seeking now to create a new agency in this case, entirely independent of the law that warrants the activity at all in foreign countries and providing that this new agency shall report, not as the organic law says it shall report, to the State Department, and from the State Department to be transmitted to the Department of Commerce, but provides that the report shall be made first hand to the Department of Commerce. At the time this was submitted, the Chair, after Mr. RAINEY insisted upon his point of order, declared:

> The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

Now, then, I wish again to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the only authority under the law which the foreign-relations activities of the Commerce Department have to exist at all is that which was conferred under the Bureau of Manufactures and Statistics, and is the law which is referred to as being prescribed. There has been no other law prescribed since that time for their conduct or control beyond that, which distinctly says:

That all cosular officers of the United States, including consuls general, consuls, and commercial agents—

That includes these agents from the Department of Commerce as well as any other kind of agents, for there is no other law creating or authorizing the creation of commercial agents—are hereby required, and it is made a part of their duty under the direction of the Secretary of State, to gather and compile from time to time useful and material information and statistics in respect to the subjects enumerated in section 3 of this act in the countries and places to which such consular officers are accredited, and to send under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the information and statistics thus gathered and compiled, with reports to be transmitted through the State Department.

Not through the Department of Commerce but through the State Department to the Department of Commerce, absolutely changing the very fundamentals of this transaction and the manner in which it is conducted.

Now, if this rule is changed there is no limitation to the extent of possibility of the creation of numerous officers, numerous places with numerous functions, and with numerous prescribed duties to perform. It is within the confines of law now and it is very important that it should be kept within the confines of law. For to take and give greater opportunity to the bureaus of this Government—I am not now particularly referring to the Department of Commerce, but to all others—when we all know how prone they are to take an ell when you give them an inch, is but an entering wedge, and I dare say that the framers of this statute had in mind the fact of these abuses when they said that they should conduct their business as prescribed by law; not by the direction of the Secretary of Commerce can they do this or do that, and not in his discretion can they create new places and new responsibilities and provide a new manner whereby and under which their business shall be conducted with reference to reports, and so forth, but that they shall do it as prescribed by law, and they can not do it otherwise. It is prescribed by law that their activities shall be conducted through the State Department.

Now, they are creating an entire new officer here, giving him a new name, giving him new duties and responsibilities, and asking him and directing him to report, not to the Department of State as the law says he shall report, but to report immediately to the Department of Commerce, which would be absolutely unwarranted by law, and seeking, if you please, by this legislation upon an appropriation bill to make it law.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the Chair's attention to some further language of this act. I think under the general powers which I read to the Chair first this legislation is in order upon the same theory that they declared legislation to be in order on the Agricultural bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman draw any distinction between this case and the case referred to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD]?

Mr. SISSON. I am going to call the Chair's attention to the fact that in addition to the powers I have just read, in this section 671, Bond's Federal Code, in reference to the transfer of officers and bureaus now, all the powers that the Secretary of State has in reference to gathering statistics and information in reference to our business abroad, and down on the next page, 158, it says:

The Bureau of Foreign Commerce, now in the State Department, be, and the same hereby is, transferred to the Department of Commerce and Labor and consolidated with and made a part of the Bureau of Statistics hereinbefore transferred from the Department of the Treasury to the Department of Commerce and Labor, and the two shall constitute one bureau, to be called the Bureau of Statistics, with a chief of bureau, and that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall have control of the work of gathering and distributing statistical information naturally relating to the subject pertaining to his department.

Showing in transferring to this department that which has heretofore been transacted through the State Department in the consular offices has been specifically transferred to the Department of Commerce, thereby specifically directing that this work shall be done under the Department of Commerce. So not only the general power, but the specific power granted to the consuls, is transferred by this act to the Department of Commerce and such agencies as it might direct.

Mr. UPSHAW rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to speak to the point of order?

Mr. UPSHAW. To the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the germaneness of this amendment is incontestable. It is the province of the State Department to establish comity and promote fellowship between the nations. It is the province of the Department of Commerce to bulid up the commercial prosperity of the Nation, and it is utterly unthinkable that the Department of Commerce can thus function alone, sitting here in Washington. It must have its special representatives far and near. And if that is true, then certainly it is the duty, and clearly it is within the province of this Congress, to furnish the means necessary to carry out the activities of this Department of Commerce, both at home and abroad.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does the gentleman realize that from the time of the formation of the Department of Commerce up until just a matter of four or five years ago there were no such things as commercial attachés? All this foreign trade information, this foreign trade promotion, was conducted by the agents of the Department of State, and the information was transmitted through them to the Department of Commerce here.

Mr. UPSHAW. My answer to that, offhand, is that the world is much bigger now than it was then, and if America keeps abreast of the times and walks full handed into the world opportunity that is now new born, we must help the Department of Commerce to function according to the law, as brought out by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes, sir.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that one of the main reasons for the creation of these commercial attachés and these agents for the Department of Commerce was the fact that the business men, the manufacturers of this country, realized that they were not getting the information to which they were entitled, and that this was put in largely as the result of the demand of the United States Chamber of Commerce and other chambers of commerce located throughout the country?

Mr. UPSHAW. That fact supports the very point I wanted to stress.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to quote a sentence from the organic act of 1903 establishing the Department of Commerce, as follows:

And all consular officers of the United States, including consuls general, consuls, and commercial agents, are hereby directed, and it is made a part of their duty, under the direction of the Secretary of State, to gather and compile from time to time useful and material information and statistics in respect to the subjects enumerated in section 3 of this act in the countries and places to which such consular officers are accredited, and to send, under the direction of the Secretary of State, reports as often as required by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor of the information and statistics thus gathered and compiled, such reports to be transmitted through the State Department to the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen who have discussed this amendment and the point of order have laid great stress upon the circumstance that in order for the Department of Commerce at home efficiently to function abroad it was necessary for the department to have these commercial attachés act as their representatives abroad. Congress, when it created this great department in 1903, foresaw that the Department of Commerce would need to have its tentacles spreading throughout the world and centering in Washington, and it therefore provided in express language that the existing organization of the Department of State should feed to the Department of Commerce such information as the Department of Commerce might from time to time desire.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. In just one moment. Congress particularly recognized, it seems, that the attempt might be made by the Department of Commerce to extend its activities just in the way it has sought to extend them—by the commercial attachés. It regarded that as unnecessary. It recognized the fact that we had this large and expensive and efficient Consular Service spreading throughout the world. It therefore provided for a liaison between the Department of State on the one side and the Department of Commerce on the other side, and that is the purpose of the law which I have just read. That law specifically protects and cherishes the foreign service of the United States, and makes it clear that under the Department of Commerce, so far as the organic act was concerned, it was not the intent and the desire of Congress to have a new foreign service established and built up.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman contend that because that law authorizes the Department of Commerce to gain its ends by utilizing certain officers, including those named, that that phrase excludes other means and facilities?

Mr. ROGERS. The importance of that sentence, as I read it, is that Congress specifically recognized the utility of having the Department of Commerce enabled to get its overseas information conveniently. It was therefore provided that the Department of State, in existence for 125 years, should continue as it had been doing for a century and a quarter the means of collecting abroad that information and providing that the scattering of it, the diffusion of it, in this country should be under the department in this country which was then being created.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does not that very use of the word "including" indicate that there may be other means as well as those included?

Mr. ROGERS. No. The language of the statute is "all consular officers of the United States, including consuls general, consuls," and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair has been impressed with the force of the arguments of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] and of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] that this proposed provision, offered as an amendment by the gentleman from Mississippi, is in order on account of the very broad jurisdiction and discretion granted in the act creating the Department of Commerce. The Chair, if this came to him in the first instance, would hesitate considerably about holding such an amendment to be out of order. However, the Chair is confronted by the precedent referred to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], which is absolutely in point.

At that time it was offered to insert in this bill a provision precisely similar to that just now offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, excepting only that the amount appropriated was $100,000 instead of $165,000. It was sought to justify it on the ground of the very broad field of the organic law, just as it is here.

But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY], a very excellent parliamentarian, made the point of order, and during the course of his argument laid stress, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] has, upon the overlapping of this jurisdiction between the State Department and the Department of Commerce. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] said:

> The act creating the Department of Commerce does not authorize the creation of new consular agents in a new manner, but it simply authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to collect commercial data at home and abroad in various ways and through our commercial agents abroad. But our commercial agents and attachés abroad are required by the act to report directly to the Secretary of State, and through the Secretary of State the reports may be transmitted to the Secretary of Commerce. This is clearly new legislation and it is contrary to the existing law. I am compelled to make the point of order.

The Chair promptly sustained the point of order.

The situation to-day is precisely what it was then, and while the Chair admits that he would be in some doubt if this matter came before him as a new proposition, yet in view of the only precedent directly controlling, namely, that just cited, where the decision was rendered by an extremely competent parliamentarian, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this decision is so important and in view of the fact that the Chair entertains the doubt he does, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to be kind enough to take the chair.

Mr. MANN of Illinois took the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. SISSON) there were—ayes 50, noes 80.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. WOOD of Indiana and Mr. SISSON.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 105.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers report ayes 63, noes 105. Accordingly, it is decided that the decision of the Chair shall not stand as the judgment of the committee. [Applause.] The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Is the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] willing to have some agreement as to time?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I feel that it is due to the committee, to the House, and especially to the public that the information in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations be given to the House, and that the public may know what it is, so that the entire country may understand the woeful waste of money that is going on by reason of the overlapping of these various activities, which are admitted by the gentleman who appeared before the committee representing the Department of Commerce as well as by those who appeared representing the Department of State.

I do not believe that we are doing the country any good service by railroading this all-important matter through. I have no more interest in the determination of this question than any other Representative ought to have. I believe that we are all interested, or should be, in seeing that the country gets the best possible service for the money that it is paying, and if these errors exist they should be removed and the information should be brought to the House which will lead the House to remove them, so that hereafter there will not be this waste, this overlapping, this duplication of work which is not only wasteful of money but wasteful of effort, producing constant inefficiency. So I would like to agree upon some time. I want a little time myself, whether any other gentlemen do or not.

Mr. SISSON. I think there ought to be some time for debate, because the issue will be raised as to whether or not this money is wasted, and as to whether or not there should be any disturbance of this particular activity at this time. I am willing, if the committee desire, to agree upon a reasonable time for debate, or I am willing to take the vote now. I presume the opinion of the committee is already determined, but I have no desire to prevent debate.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. How much time does the gentleman think there should be?

Mr. SISSON. Anything from 5 to 15 minutes on a side.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I understand that no matter what may be said in opposition to the present attitude of the House, it will make no difference; but notwithstanding the apparent desire of some gentlemen to vote on this question, I ask unanimous consent that I be given 25 minutes in which to speak on this subject.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree that the gentleman shall take more time than is to be consumed on this side, because there are many gentlemen on both sides of the House who desire to speak on this question, and I should be glad to accommodate as many as I can.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Then I propose an hour on a side.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, I want 20 minutes on this.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I should like to have an hour. I was the author of the bill creating the Department of Commerce and Labor.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LONGWORTH). This is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. CALDWELL. The regular order has been demanded, and under the rule there are five minutes on a side.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order being demanded, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] for five minutes.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman from Indiana desires an hour, I have no objection myself. Of course, we will ask that the time be equally divided. I have no objection to an hour on a side if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Chairman. We have all got our minds made up. Let us vote.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I suggest that we have one hour—30 minutes on a side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed at the end of one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Chairman. We have all got our minds made up.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to one hour. Thirty minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi and 30 by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that that is not in order. It is in order to move to close debate at the expiration of any time, but not in order to divide the time. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, in order that we may get the matter settled, I ask unanimous consent that the debate be limited to one hour, one half of it to be controlled by the gentleman from Indiana and the other half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Indiana and one-half by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in one hour.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to that by making it 20 minutes, 10 minutes on a side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CALDWELL moves to amend the motion by making it 20 minutes instead of one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SISSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] and the other half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that one-half the time be controlled by the gentleman from Indiana and one-half by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE].

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, the Department of Commerce when it was organized in 1903 took, as has been stated here to-day, the Bureau of Manufactures and the Bureau of Statistics over from the State Department under that act. In 1912, under Secretary Cortelyou, these two departments were consolidated into the Department of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. Last year we appropriated $910,000 for this service. There are not many men in this department. All told, the personnel is 341. The Appropriations Committee has cut down the appropriation from $910,510 to $487,000, practically reducing it to one-half of that appropriated last year.

When this department was originally organized we had very little foreign trade or commerce carried in American bottoms. To-day we have a large fleet of ships. We are the second largest shipping nation in the world. From less than 2,000,000 dead-weight tons of overseas shipping in 1915 we have grown to over 9,000,000 dead-weight tons. A large part of the tonnage under our flag is owned by the United States. If you cut off our foreign commercial representatives you will destroy the earning power of the Nation's ships.

We have nothing to be very proud of, either, in the last year's foreign commerce, for Great Britain, crippled by four years of war, carried $800,000,000 more of foreign commerce than did the United States.

Now, the question is, Who should do this work? We have a system now of representation in foreign countries consisting of the consular representatives, military attachés, the naval attachés, Shipping Board agents at seaports, and the Department of Commerce attachés and agents. Formerly Great Britain had the same as we have, four or five different sets of agents in every principal city in the world. Three years ago she appointed a commission to make a study of this, and she has cut her attachés and agents down and put them under one head, known as the Foreign Trade Promotion Service. She has centralized all this work under one man in the cabinet and calls it the department of overseas trade. All have to report to him, even the consular agents, in anything affecting commerce.

To-day we are in the position of having all of these five classes of representatives in foreign lands. It is a criminal expenditure of the people's money. For instance, in Brazil we have an ambassador and two secretaries, a military attaché and one assistant military attaché, one naval attaché and three assistant naval attachés, and last of all, one commercial attaché, and all of these departments have numerous clerks and assistants. The fact is all over South America the Navy has from two to five times as many men as the Department of Commerce has. The Army also far exceeds in number the Department of Commerce.

Should we support in South America and in Asia and Europe this great number of military, naval, and consular representatives, and cut in half the paltry sum of $910,000 which we appropriated last year for foreign and domestic commerce? I am in favor of economy and I am in sympathy with the effort for economy shown by this committee, but we must not injure our growing foreign trade. We have a surplus of farm products, a surplus from our mines, and our factories are producing far beyond our needs. This country should make every effort to expand its foreign trade and establish its business in every port of the world. Let me read an extract from a speech of Sir Hamar Greenwood, Member of Parliament, as to the new department established in Great Britain. This address was delivered at the Manchester Chamber of Commerce on November 27, 1919:

Let me come to my own department—the department of overseas trade—the department established during the war to assist overseas trade. I can assure you that from the letters of appreciation we receive in growing numbers that department, I think, is a success. On November 20 last the whole of the consular and commercial secretarial services were handed over to the department of overseas trade, over which I preside. Subject, therefore, to the approval of Lord Curzon, or the secretary of state for foreign affairs, consuls and commercial secretaries are now part of the department of overseas trade. That means that in that department, under that department, and by that department consuls and commercial diplomatic officers are recruited for the services. They are transferred, promoted, and retired, and it is done entirely in the interests of trade.

I ask you gentlemen here to-day to assist in the building up of our foreign commerce. Every commercial organization in this country interested in foreign commerce has been telegraphing to their Congressmen to assist in making this appropriation the same as it was last year, and indeed many of them have asked for a great increase. On Tuesday last I spent all day in New York talking with commercial men. Not a single one of them said he received help from the Department of State or War or Navy, but every man interested in foreign trade said that he got the greatest assistance from the agents and attachés of the Department of Commerce.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. BAER. Is it not a fact that the information that the State Department and the Navy Department gets now is mostly kept secret, and the business men of the country are not able to get that information? I have several cases where I can not get information about foreign trade from those departments.

Mr. ROWE. I think the gentleman is correct, and I call his attention to some information along that line. Nearly all of our reports to the State Department, to the Navy, and to the Army come in 2 to 3, and often 20, days late. Take, for instance, the report on the relaxation of the control over exports and imports in France. It was reported by the commercial attaché on May 14, 1919, and published in the commerce reports on May 16, 1919. The same information was reported by the consul general on May 17, 1919, and was received by the Department of Commerce from the State Department on May 21. In other words, the Commerce Department had the information three days before the State Department and had published it to the commercial interests of this country before the State Department received it.

Another instance: The removal of French import prohibitions, reported by commercial attaché on June 18, 1919; published by Department of Commerce June 21, 1919; reported by consul to State Department June 28, 1919; turned over to Department of Commerce by State Department July 1, 1919.

Our commerce will not admit of delays; we must do business in a business way, and then we can expect results. Let us give this department the same money we gave them last year, and in the near future I shall ask this House to consider a joint resolution for the appointment of a commission to make a careful study of our agents and representatives in foreign lands and see if we can not greatly reduce the expense and largely increase their efficiency.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I can not fully discuss this subject in three minutes, but I do want to briefly reply to the remarks made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD]. The gentleman stated that this constituted an expense upon the part of the Government and was a waste of public money. This bureau was organized at the instance of the business interests of this country. The United States Chamber of Commerce conducted a referendum over the country, and out of more than 800 chambers of commerce, all of them with the exception of something like 20 asked Congress to establish this bureau and to continue it. The statement was made, I think, by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] that these bureaus ought to be attached to the Department of State. I insist that this is not a diplomatic function, but is a purely commercial affair that should be looked after by the Department of Commerce, which was established for the purpose of looking after our domestic and foreign commerce. I call attention to the fact that in practically all of the European countries to-day the commercial attachés are not attached to the foreign office. The hearings show that in Great Britain they have an overseas trade department, not attached to the foreign office. The same is true in France, where the attachés are attached to the ministry of commerce and industry. The same is true of Italy, where the attachés are attached to the ministry of agriculture, industry, and commerce. In the Netherlands the attachés are under the ministry of agriculture, industry, and commerce. This was also true of the Russian Empire before the revolution. The only country in Europe where the commercial attachés were attached to the foreign office was in Germany.

That is the practice of the European countries, and I submit that if now, at the close of the war, when everything is chaotic, at a time when every country in the world is reaching out for the trade of the world, attempting to get possession of it, we take the position of reducing those agencies which were established in times of peace for the purpose of developing our foreign commerce we will be taking a backward step. They were established for the purpose of promoting, fostering, and developing our commerce. To take such a step would be resented, and properly so, by the business and manufacturing interests of the country. I am anxious to see this Congress not take a backward step, but to at least continue the current appropriations, not only as to commercial attachés, but also in the interest of promoting our foreign and domestic commerce in Europe and in Central and South America and in the Far East. [Applause.]

If we fail to do so, we will be derelict in our duty and heedless of the opportunities of our country to capture and retain the valuable trade of the world.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE].

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I would like very much to agree with the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. WOOD of Indiana] having the bill in charge, but as I look over the hearings I fail to find any testimony which justifies either the charge of extravagance he has made, or the charge that there is an overlapping of work by representatives of these two great departments, Commerce and State. On page 2429 of the hearings Mr. Kennedy, the Director of Foreign Commerce, in answer to a question in respect to the duty of the consul, said that the consul deals with matters which are more or less local. A little later on, page 2432 of his testimony, Mr. Kennedy said in answer to a question by Mr. SISSON that the commercial attaché gives none of his time or attention to the local work of the consul and that he was not necessarily tied down or bound up to any particular office. In other words, the consuls remained in a permanent office and the commercial attachés operate throughout the entire country, making observations as to all manner of commercial activity and enterprises and keep American manufacturers and American business men in close touch with information as a result of their observations. If there ever was a time in the history of our country when business men and the shippers should be assisted it seems to me that it is now. We are attempting to establish a great merchant marine, and we talk about expanding our commerce and encouraging the upbuilding of our foreign trade relations. To do what the committee wishes would be to take a step looking toward retrenchment in the export business of the country. The passage of their recommendations would be an interference with the opportunities which the American shipper and the American manufacturer ought to have to aid him in entering a foreign field. To say the least, it is an unwise economy, at a time when we are attempting to establish a great American merchant marine. It would be petty economy to handicap the business men of the country, and it seems rather picayune, when we consider the small amount of money this bureau is expending, to attempt to cut in half these appropriations, and at the same time cut the shippers of the country off from information which they ought to have at first hand.

I have telegrams here from agencies in Philadelphia, the chamber of commerce of that city, and one of the largest banks, asking that a proper force be maintained, which I wish to read:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., February 25, 1920.

HON. WILLIAM S. VARE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce strongly opposes any reduction being made in present commercial attachés service.

ALBA B. JOHNSON,
President.
N. B. KELLEY,
General Secretary.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., February 24, 1920.

HON. WILLIAM S. VARE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Urgently hope Commerce Department be allowed ample appropriations for commercial attachés, commercial agents, and district officers, since this department greatly assisted many of your constituents during the past year.

CHAS. S. CALDWELL,
President Corn Exchange National Bank.

In view of the work done by these trade investigators, which, in the eyes of those for whom the work was intended, has been very successful, I hope the House will approve the restoration of the amounts given this bureau last year at least.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman desire to use some time?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We have only one more speech on our side.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. I hesitate to take issue with the committee on the position it has taken with reference to reducing the amount heretofore allowed for foreign and domestic commerce.

I believe in real economy, not only at this time but at all times, in connection with the operation of governmental departments. But this effort to economize should not be carried to such an extreme that it will actually militate against the business men and laboring men of this country.

In providing for this service through the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce Congress virtually said to the business men of this country, "You prepare for foreign trade and your Government will cooperate with you."

After this appropriation was made and attachés were assigned to foreign countries men lectured before commercial clubs, rotary clubs, chambers of commerce, and manufacturers' associations throughout the country urging the business men of the United States to engage in foreign trade. Schools were opened in connection with various industries and organizations to instruct in the matter of foreign service. Pamphlets were issued instructing men how to pack goods for foreign shipment. You will recall that newspapers, magazines, and various prominent publications saw the importance of our country engaging in foreign trade, and urged American business men to study this problem and avail themselves of this Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

There is no doubt that many manufacturers reorganized their business or reorganized their industries to enter into this new field, and that they did so because of the assurance of Government cooperation. Many firms have established points of contact through the commercial attachés and now rely on this important service.

Many of these companies that have engaged in foreign trade are not sufficiently established in financial strength and in the magnitude of their business to put their own commercial men into foreign fields. It must be remembered in this connection that in addition to the normal expenses for traveling and entertainment, which are very high in South America, must be added the taxes which are levied by foreign countries on foreign salesmen. This is the case in Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Switzerland, Portugal, Brazil, Uruguay, Paraguay, Argentina, Bolivia, Mexico, British Columbia, South Africa, and New Zealand. In addition to the State or Federal tax municipal taxes are sometimes found. The State of Buenos Aires charges a traveler's tax of $400 and the city of Buenos Aires an additional $500. This tax may be a monthly charge, as in Sweden, or a yearly payment, as in Switzerland. In France foreign travelers enjoy the same treatment accorded French commercial travelers in the country from which they hail.

With the cooperation of the Government our business men may be able in time to put their own men in foreign countries, but until they have developed the trade to a point that will warrant it, they must rely on the service that the Government is prepared to render.

This service will enable small concerns to build up a clientele in South America and elsewhere, and eventually these new concerns will have enough business to enable them to put their own men in the foreign field.

It is hard to imagine anything that this Government could do that would be more pleasing to our foreign commercial rivals, such as Great Britain, Japan, France, Italy, and even Germany, than to herald the news that the business men of the United States would have no cooperation from the Government in securing foreign trade.

The failure of this Government to furnish the American business men with this service is notice to our business men that they will not have the cooperation of their Government in securing foreign business.

It is notice to the business men in competing countries to organize without delay to go after foreign trade with full assurance that they can do so with the support and cooperation of their own Government and without fear that the United States will assist her business men who wish to compete with them.

For years we have permitted our goods to be carried in ships flying a foreign flag, and now, when the American business man is rejoicing that we have a merchant marine, we propose to destroy the department that is essential to provide the business necessary to keep the flag on our merchant ships. It is difficult to imagine any alleged policy of economy we could adopt to bring greater joy to our commercial rivals than the proposal to withdraw from foreign trade. The American business man is being taxed for every other Government service, and it would seem from the telegrams and letters that are coming in protesting against the failure of Congress to continue this service that he is entitled to consideration, especially when he knows that the burden of footing this bill will largely fall on him.

When making an investiagtion of this service I found in a standard work on foreign commerce that the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce now maintains offices in the following cities: New York, Chicago, Boston, St. Louis, New Orleans, San Francisco, Seattle, and cooperative offices in connection with the following institutions: The Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, Southern Railway system, Portland Chamber of Commerce, and the Greater Dayton Association.

The same authority has the following to say:

The foreign trade department of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce has a library on trade subjects and is equipped to answer questions on trade subjects and is equipped to answer questions relating to the harbor problems of the world, the cost of entering and clearing, loading and discharging of vessels, the kind of loading facilities available in each harbor and the best way of routing a shipment.

The Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, like many other chambers, a cooperative branch office of the United States Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, has a classified record of manufacturers in Cleveland and vicinity interested in foreign trade and how their export business is handled; a library of maps, trade journals, Government publications, cable codes, and commercial directories, a permanent exhibit of documents used in shipping and financing an export order, and a compilation of data respecting goods produced in or near Cleveland.

The same foreign trade department has made investigations regarding the market conditions in various parts of the world in specific lines, such as cutting tools, paper and paper goods, and aluminum cooking utensils. Arrangements have been made with trade-mark attorneys in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, and Cuba to register Cleveland-owned trade-marks at a special rate. Assistance is given in the collecting of accounts in foreign countries.

A translation service is at the disposal of members who do not have the command of the language of their foreign customers. A large number of pamphlets have been published dealing with topics such as "Your trade-mark in Cuba" and "Foreign trade reports."

There is hardly a city of any size that is not interested in this important service. The failure to support this Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce will be a severe blow to the business men of this country and will tend to disorganize and discourage those who have gone to all this expense to engage in foreign trade.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW]. [Applause.]

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield the last minute of my period to my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY].

Gentlemen, this is a question which could be talked on intelligently for a very long time, but the opportunity is not forthcoming. We are appropriating much money here, and are urged to appropriate a lot more than we know how to get. Naturally and properly we are trying to be economical, and I will join my brethren in that undertaking, but on this particular proposition before us now it is not a question of spending the Government's money. It is a question of putting our people in line to make more in order that we can get profits and thereby the money we need to pay our taxes and carry on our Government. [Applause.] The commercial attachés under discussion are a direct aid to the selling forces of our producers. A few years ago, even with our Consular Service in full force and all the rest of the diplomatic organization in order, we began to realize that we knew but little about foreign trade, hence the development of this particular branch. Since then we have gone ahead, and it should be said to the everlasting credit of Secretary Redfield that he stimulated foreign trade and did more for it, through the agency of our Government, than any other man. [Applause.] I could give you one case after another, illustrated in dollars and cents, to show concerns which before the development of this foreign-trade department with its attachés had never done any foreign business, but which more lately, up to the time war began, had come to do a very profitable business. Only very big, rich concerns can send salesmen and investigators world wide, but by virtue of this organization of commercial attachés thousands of smaller producers have been able to get the benefit of information, initiation, and such helpful assistance as to put us on the map for overseas trade.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, while Germany and England are trying to reconstruct and rejuvenate their countries we are trying to tear down and cripple the machinery of government by cutting out these commercial attachés—only 12 of them—whereas England, I understand, for the same purpose has provided 60 commercial attachés to build up its business. It may be that a year from day after to-morrow you may have your Secretary of Commerce on the Republican side inducted into office, and having such a representative in the next Cabinet [applause on the Republican side] you surely would not cripple the machinery of government by the sheerest and falsest kind of economy. I know whereof I speak. I have known many of these commercial attachés who have gone from Government service into industrial life, where they have received double the salaries on account of their capabilities and competency, and while Government servants they have furnished invaluable information to the cotton manufacturers and the cotton growers and to the woolen and cotton manufacturers, leather merchants, and boot and shoe manufacturers the country over. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON].

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment to restore this appropriation to the figures of last year. From my limited knowledge I believe that this is one of the most important functions that we are performing in foreign countries. I say that because of my intimate acquaintance with one of the commercial attachés. I refer to Prof. Lincoln Hutchinson, the commercial attaché in London. He told me of the special test which these commercial attachés are put to in order to qualify them for their work. They must not only have a thorough grounding in economics and in special commercial training but they must also be qualified from a language standpoint. Prof. Hutchinson for a long time was commercial attaché at Rio de Janeiro. Then he was specially detailed to the Council of National Defense for special economic work. He was then sent to Paris for special work on the question of tin allocation; then he was sent to Czechoslovakia, and after completing his work there he returned to the University of California. Afterwards he was called by the department to go to London. This shows the manner in which the Department of Commerce chooses these experts. I have no doubt they choose the experts in all places as they have chosen this man, who is so well qualified for the work. I am distinctly in favor of this appropriation.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL].

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, during the past six years most of the good will established by the exporting houses of all countries has been lost. The business connections on which this trade rests will have to be built up again from nothing. At present this is a free field, and I think that we should make every effort to establish ourselves in a position which will be easy to attain now and from which it will be difficult to dislodge us in the future. It will be a very hard matter to catch up with England, France, or Japan if we let them get the start.

Every commercial house in the country feels that this amendment will be a good thing for our export trade, and it is to be presumed that they know what is best for their own interests, which are the interests of the country.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] three minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much surprised and amazed in examining the report of the hearings held before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations to find how limited was the information which was revealed upon which they proposed to reduce the appropriations for the maintenance of the Department of Commerce for the year ending June 30, 1921. An examination of the report, beginning with page 46 of the detailed statement of the proposed reductions, presented items covering nearly every branch of that important department, which, if carried into effect, would have destroyed its efficiency. And I have had quite a little experience along business lines. More than 50 years ago I was interested in my own city in the plans devised for the extension of the foreign trade of the United States. On account of the depression of our manufacturing business, an enterprising treasurer was sent from there to go out and endeavor to provide a market for our manufactured products. He went to South America and ascertained that if we were to obtain foreign trade we had endeavored to solve a very difficult problem. Agents of foreign Governments had preceded us and had laid their foundations so securely that it was found that if we desired to extend our foreign trade we must learn how to pack our manufactured materials that we wanted to ship so that we could send the same to the customers who desired to buy and use them, and the effort then was unsuccessful. A little later business became good at home and it was not necessary to extend our foreign commerce in order to sell American goods. But now we are met with the competition of the whole world, and we go out into the world's markets and we find ourselves limited by the recommendations of this subcommittee. In view of the determination of every foreign Government to make liberal appropriations and in every manner to obtain our own home trade and extend their foreign trade, I unhesitatingly declare the report submitted by this committee as the most narrow piece of legislation I have ever known to be presented in this House during my 21 years of membership in this body.

I decline to vote for the acceptance of the report in the name of the people of New England, whom I represent in part, and in the name of the business men throughout the country, who had a right to expect that better legislation would be proposed if it is expected that we shall keep the United States in the forefront in seeking the markets of the world. [Applause.] I tried by what I considered legitimate methods to find out what this bill meant. The Department of State or the Committee on Foreign Affairs are behind this whole proposition. They do not expose themselves. They are hidden in this report. Diplomacy which is evident in every act of that committee is not the usual method adopted by business men when competing for foreign or domestic trade. But whatever condemnation may come to me for the opposition I have taken upon this report presented to-day I am proud of the opportunity I have to maintain the business interests of New England. The city of Boston had but one representative here to-day, Representative TAGUE, but he could obtain no time to speak in opposition to the report because of the limited debate, but by his vote he was recorded in opposition to the report submitted by the subcommittee and in defense of the business interests of Boston. I am proud to represent the interests of New England and represent the interests of my own city of Fall River, Mass., that has 114 cotton mills, and the interests of the cities of Taunton, Attleboro, and the towns of North Attleboro and Mansfield, which, with other manufacturing establishments, have been trying through their chambers of commerce and by their ability and ingenuity to develop their foreign trade.

Early in 1919 I spoke regarding the importance of uniting the work of all the departments of the Government in extending our foreign trade. It had never been suggested to me that it was the intention of the Department of State to absorb the functions of the Department of Commerce until it was revealed by the subcommittee in explaining their intentions to economize as the best method to promote foreign trade.

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, all Members must bear in mind, has no appropriation at its disposal, but it has been devoting its time to building up a merchant marine, and it has presented much legislation which has been considered favorably by the House of Representatives.

The aforesaid committee is obliged to obtain money through the Committee on Appropriations. They have made the appropriations for the maintenance of the Shipping Board ever since the passage of the shipping act. There has been a large number of vessels constructed under their jurisdiction, with the purpose in view of building up the foreign commerce of the United States. If the methods pursued by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations in unreasonably reducing the appropriations for the maintenance of the Department of Commerce is to be their continued purpose, I hope they may be induced to openly declare that purpose in order that the Members of the House of Representatives may be informed of their intentions hereafter.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I am going to take up only a short time in explanation of a personal experience I had in connection with the use of consular agents to build up the trade of the United States. In 1915 I was in the consular office at Kobe, Japan. There was a man who came in there, a Japanese, who wanted to buy some files. He realized that at that time the war was on. England had supplied this market, but most of the factories of England had been taken up in making munitions and could not supply the trade, and this man was hunting for new sources of supply. The consular agent said, "I will take your request down and send it on." I said, "What will happen now?" after the man went out. He said, "I will send it to the State Department, and when they get ready they will send it over to the Department of Commerce, and they will publish in a little paper something like this: '3284. A man in Kobe, Japan, would like to have some files.' In six months from now the man may or may not get an answer. In the meantime he has bought his files. This is the regulation of the State Department in connection with this business. I know file manufacturers in the United States and could give him the names of half a dozen, but it is absolutely impossible for me to say anything to this man or give him any information at all so that he can get his files within any sort of reasonable time."

This is true of all the consular offices. They spoke to me about it in several of them. I sent them a Pennsylvania directory of manufacturers, so that they could get a list of men by reading it. A consular agent can not get along with these other duties without stultifying himself by advocating any particular establishment. The agent from the Department of Commerce can take the names and supply them to the manufacturers. They can get the supplies quickly. If we continue this through the State Department, we will just waste our money.

That is the opinion of everybody who knows anything about the work of the State Department in connection with the building up of trade. We should take it away from the State Department. It should be placed absolutely in the hands of the Department of Commerce.

The State of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia have been spending a quarter of a million dollars annually for the last 20 years on their Commercial Museum in Philadelphia to do a part of what is being accomplished by this department down here. It is only asking of you about a million dollars or so, and certainly the amount of money can not be any object at all compared with the accomplishment that will come from the proper and active use of these men in foreign markets. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WALSH). The gentleman from Pennsylvania yields back half a minute.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, the total of appropriations for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is reduced from $910,510 to $487,470, or by $423,040.

Mr. Chairman, this is false economy, because such a reduction as this will undoubtedly cripple this important branch of our Government. It will force the abolition of the department's commercial attachés, a reduction in the number of foreign trade commissioners, and an abandonment of the district offices maintained at leading American ports for the service of Americans interested in export and import trade.

Think of it, gentlemen of the House, at the very time when we are building up an American merchant marine to carry the products of our farms, forests, mines, and factories to the markets of the world, this bill proposes to cripple the force that we are depending upon to furnish us with the information which is absolutely necessary as the foundation upon which to build our domestic and foreign business.

The committee, if it believes the American policy in this matter should be reversed, ought to come out in the open and say so and prove itself consistent by cutting out the appropriation altogether instead of giving the department such a pittance. If we are to do away with our national policy, it should be done in the open and not by indirection. If we are to keep it up, we should give it a sufficient amount to make it effective. Unless an amendment is adopted increasing the appropriation in the bill, it will mean that the oak tree of our foreign commerce will be driven back to the acorn. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana yields back one minute.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, it is not only the people of the seaboard cities, the large ports of the country on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the Gulf, who have an intense interest in this matter. Personally I regret that I can not agree with the subcommittee reporting this appropriation bill. I do not think that any particular criticism should be meted out to them. They are trying to follow out the program of retrenchment and economy to which we are all committed. But, Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition in which we can ill afford at this time to practice any economy which would be harmful to the business interests of this country. The cities of the Middle West, and throughout the country generally, which are interested in manufacturing are also interested in commerce and in finding markets for the products of their factories and their shops, and we from Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, and the great manufacturing cities of the West join with the representatives of the seaboard cities in urging that this appropriation should be made as proposed by the amendment.

There never was a time in the history of the country, as has already been said, when it has been so important that we should maintain and enlarge our foreign commerce. Whether or not there is any overlapping of these appropriations may be waived for the present, and if the work has not been properly organized let the proper committees and let the proper departments make suggestions for a reorganization of the work. But let us continue now, under present conditions, the plans and the organizations which we have, in order that we may not lose the present opportunity of keeping and increasing our share of the world's commerce. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois yields back half a minute.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, Edmund Burke once said that false economy is like the brier, which, when it is held directly in front of the eye, shuts out the giant oak a hundred yards away. That is an exact description of the economy practiced by this Committee on Appropriations in reporting this bill, which strikes down entirely the valuable structure reared by the commercial attachés of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in the Department of Commerce.

In order to save the appropriation of $165,000, it is proposed to sacrifice the interests of American commerce to the extent of many millions of dollars. It is a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy. It is the brier which shuts out the oak. It should not be agreed to by this Congress.

Mr. Chairman, in May, 1919, I talked with a representative of the American Tobacco Co. in Athens, capital city of Greece. I remember vividly the incidents he described of large sums of money being lost by American business men simply because they did not have the benefit of exact information as to market conditions and the assistance of an American representative. He stated that he knew personally of losses to the extent of $400,000 since the first of the year which were due to such causes. One incident he related concerned a shipload of codfish sent out from Boston. There should have been a profit made on that shipment, but there was a loss of $50,000 due to the lack of exact knowledge as to how to proceed.

Oh, there was a splendid consul in Athens, one of the ablest I have ever met. He was working long hours on multitudinous duties, and it was a physical impossibility for him to attend to the details necessary for the advancement of American commerce. A live-wire commercial attaché, assigned to Greece and charged solely with duties connected with commerce, would have saved to American business interests in six months twice the amount asked for all these commercial attachés for an entire year.

This is a new day in the world, and America stands preeminent in it. It is no time now to go backward and to attempt to meet 1920 conditions by a return to the policies of 1820. I am in favor of increasing this splendid effort for the promotion of our foreign trade, not destroying it. I believe every business interest in America, every real American, desires that this Nation take the place to which it is entitled in world commerce.

Mr. Chairman, business means much in America. Christopher Columbus was hunting a business route to the East Indies when he discovered it. From the first settlement on this continent it has been the purpose of America to express itself to the world through its industrial achievements, its worthy commerce in those things which are needed for the benefit and comfort of humanity.

I contend that our dreadnoughts and our military power do not express the real spirit of America so much as our mills and mines and factories and our entire commercial structure. We are essentially an industrial, producing Nation none the less surely, though upon occasion we astonish the world by marshaling an army of millions and breaking the back of a Prussian autocracy on bloody battle field. Our mission in the world is not to become a world conqueror by force of arms but to become a world conqueror by force of service.

Real business is but another name for service. It means being of use to the peoples of the world by taking to them at just prices the things we have invented and produced. It means taking to them the cars and rails and telephones and typewriters and air brakes and harvesting machines and tractors and other commodities conceived by American brains and wrought out by American hands. That is the best way in which we can do our share of the teamwork of a world. That is the way in which Americans would express our national character to other nations.

This Congress should recognize the fact that there is a program of preparedness in recognizing the industrial power, the business gifts, the advertising genius of America, and that such recognition may well help defend the American Continent from hostile attack. Instead of destroying this successful method of advancing our interests and our purposes abroad it would be wise statesmanship to increase it manyfold.

Mr. Chairman, four years ago our flag was a curiosity in almost every foreign port. Even our mails moved by alien will and the grace of alien flags. Our consul at Gibraltar told me that for years prior to 1914 scarcely an American vessel had sailed between the Pillars of Hercules.

"But now," he said, "we are again coming into our own. From January to June, 1919, more than 400 vessels flying the American flag have cleared from this port of Gibraltar."

We can not maintain our merchant marine without foreign trade. If we are to make good our traditional claim of freedom of the seas, we must have American ships carrying American goods. We can not have that without a first-hand knowledge of world markets and world needs. There must be representatives of proper caliber in foreign fields, and that has been the exact purpose in sending out these commercial attachés.

They must be specialists in business. They must know the customs and language of the countries to which they are sent. They must remain long enough to know the vastly different conditions which prevail in other lands. It is unthinkable that Congress will now deliberately destroy all that has been done by approving the action of this Appropriation Committee in striking down this appropriation entirely.

I have received many letters protesting against this action on the part of the committee, and in almost every instance they came from the relatively small manufacturers, those who can not possibly maintain a resident agent in foreign lands, but who can add to American prosperity by extending our foreign trade and who can also benefit the lands which receive their products. These business men deserve consideration. They are representative of the constructive business of this country, and they can help to make the world a better and easier place in which to live.

Mr. Chairman, I am confident that Congress will not allow this blow to be struck against honest, constructive American business. Let us adopt this amendment, which restores the appropriation for commercial attachés as carried in the current law. Let us continue this successful work and prove that we stand for increasing the commercial importance of America in this new day, believing that it means benefits to America and to the countries with which we trade. [Applause.]

I distinctly recall one case where $50,000 was lost on a single cargo of codfish from Boston because there was nobody there to represent the commercial interests. Oh, there was a very good consul there and a very good minister, but neither one of them had time to deal with our commercial interests, and as a result of that in one shipload $50,000 of American money was lost, when there should have been a profit, and would have been with the right kind of information. So I say to you that in that one city in three months there was a loss of more than double the expense carried by this amendment of $165,000.

I certainly hope this amendment will be agreed to, and that America, instead of going backward, will go on more and more extending her commerce, with her ships in every sea, with ever-increasing success, extending the commercial supremacy of America in the way it should be extended in this new day of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I hold no brief for the Department of Commerce, and I hold no brief for the Department of State, with reference to this proposition. I feel, however, that it is my duty to bring before this House and the country a condition, not a theory, that exists concerning this matter. Evidence has already been heard here which, if true, should be conclusive to the minds of gentlemen who have heard it that the Consular Service of the State Department in so far as it has to do with our foreign trade should be absolutely abolished. We have to-day in the service of this Government a few more than 400 consuls general. They encircle the globe, and with their supernumeraries and assistants we have upon the pay roll of the Consular Service more than 2,000 names of people supposed to be engaged in looking after and extending the foreign trade relations of the United States. If they are not doing it, they should be relieved from making a further pretense at doing it. We are appropriating, in round numbers, $9,000,000 a year for the support of our embassies and Consular Service. Far more than one-half of that amount of money is expended for the Consular Service alone. I am told by those who have had years of experience that more than three-fourths of the activities of the office of a consul general consist in looking after our foreign trade relations. Last year we appropriated, in round numbers, $900,000 for our foreign trade relations through the Department of Commerce. That, together with the amount that is appropriated for the Department of State for this same service, amounts, in round numbers, to more than $5,000,000. Somebody is spending entirely too much money for the returns we are getting.

There is a great mistake, innocently made, no doubt, with reference to the amount of our foreign trade service that can rightly be credited directly to the Department of Commerce.

More than three-fourths of the information received by the commercial world is gathered not by commercial agents from the Department of Commerce but by the consular agents under the State Department. Under the law all of this information comes first to the State Department, where matters of diplomacy are sifted out, and the commercial information of importance goes to the Department of Commerce, which issues its reports daily or weekly or as called upon, as the case may be. But the people generally have the impression that this is a peculiar activity of the Department of Commerce, when as a matter of fact the information thus gathered, as the evidence discloses, is more than three-fourths information that comes from the Department of State.

That is not all; a very short time ago we passed a law creating 25 more of these experts under the Department of State. We made a great mistake if the statements I have heard here to-day are true. If the men under the Department of State are not representing the interests of the country, then that law should be repealed. They were to be 25 expert economists for the purpose of extending foreign trade, created by the organic law of this body, placed under the Department of State, which was to engage good men who by experience were worthy of their hire.

Now, I have no criticism to make of the gentlemen who have been appointed as efficient commercial attachés. They no doubt are all gentlemen, but they are not all the kind of men that should be selected to extend our foreign trade. More than three-fourths of them are not business men, and never were, but are college professors, who never had a day's business experience in their lives.

What is desired to-day is to bring the attention of this Congress and of the public to the duplication that is going on, the friction that results in consequence of the overlapping of these departments. The Government of the United States should be foremost in regard to foreign trade. She should not be lagging behind by inefficient effort and lack of effort. We are behind every civilized nation on the face of the earth, so far as our organization is concerned, in the extension of trade. Years ago France, England, Italy, all the first-class powers, realizing that this divided responsibility resulted in confusion, inefficiency, and real detriment to business interests, consolidated their activities and placed them under one head, and in most instances under a department of foreign trade relation; all foreign countries have done this except one, which is France.

Now, why should the people of the United States be paying money for this duplication of effort? Why should the trade of the United States be compelled longer to submit to this divided responsibility between two great departments of the Government, each one jealous of the other as to which should be the real department charged with this responsibility? I dare say that the business men who have flooded Members of Congress with telegrams protesting against the action of this committee, and asking that this appropriation be restored—if they were cognizant of the facts, they would be just as insistent that the Congress act at once to remedy this evil as they are to have this provision restored. They are not getting what they are paying for. They are not getting what they are entitled to. I dare say that as far as effective results are concerned the United States is not getting 50 cents on the dollar for the amount of money expended for this service.

Now, I wish to call attention to the evidence in this case. Let it speak as to the existing situation. I am just as much interested in the extension of foreign trade as any Representative here. I would like to see this country occupy the position it should occupy and be the foremost nation on all the earth with reference to foreign trade. I believe that that accomplishment can best be had, and can only be had, by bringing together the divided responsibility that now so glaringly exists, by wiping out the duplication, by wiping out the waste that results in not only money but effort.

Mr. Kennedy, of the Department of Commerce, who is very enthusiastic in his work, testified before the committee—and I will here quote from the hearings his testimony in extenso, wherein he admits that there is duplication, admits that it results in loss of effort. He thinks it is not the fault of the Department of Commerce, but that it is the fault of the Department of State, that his department has tried so far as it can to avoid it, but that it occurs and must occur as long as there is this divided responsibility. This is what Mr. Kennedy says upon the subject:

Mr. WOOD. Do you believe the Chamber of Commerce of the United States would indorse, if they are looking after the economic interests of this country, the duplication now going on between these two departments?

Mr. KENNEDY. They state they will come here and will support the position they have taken in regard to the commercial attachés in the Department of Commerce.

Mr. SWEET. I do not believe, Mr. Wood, they would recommend the duplication, and we do not; and this bears, of course, upon the place where they think the work ought to be done and where it can be done to the best advantage.

Mr. WASON. At the time that vote was taken, and prior thereto, there was quite a country-wide propoganda in favor of it, was there not?

Mr. SWEET. I did not know there was any. We have never taken any active steps in the matter. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States did that entirely, and we had nothing to do with it.

Mr. KENNEDY. With regard to this matter of duplication, some years ago the State Department wished to take over the functions of the Bureau of Manufactures, and Congress considered the matter at that time, and they decided the matter by taking the Bureau of Foreign Commerce out of the State Department and amalgamating it with the Bureau of Manufactures of the Department of Commerce.

Mr. SISSON. Was that done during the Taft administration?

Mr. SWEET. I think so. I think that was in 1912.

Mr. KENNEDY. At that time Congress endeavored to center in one place the control of foreign commerce and the collection of this data.

Mr. SISSON. I remember at the time the question came up, this same question of duplication of service was in the minds of the committee and of Congress, and this action was taken, putting these different bureaus under the Secretary of Commerce. At that time we thought we had segregated the two activities so that there would be no overlapping between the two departments; but we have been somewhat confused here by virtue of the statute, and as we thought the actual performance of duties by the two departments. Of course, as Mr. Sweet has said, you gentlemen do not indorse duplication and do not desire duplication. (Hearings, p. 2423.)

Further along in the hearings this witness testifies:

Mr. KENNEDY. The commercial direction of the Consular Service ought to be under the direction of the Department of Commerce, and the consuls, so far as their commercial work is concerned, should report in each country to the commercial attaché. Now, further, the Department of State within the last month has been holding special examinations in order to appoint some 25 economic consuls, who it is intended shall devote their entire time to making economic investigations. Unless these economic consuls report directly to the commercial attachés and through them to the Department of Commerce there is duplication.

Mr. WOOD. You will admit, then, that there is much duplication now under our system of having our consular agents represent the business interests of this country and the commercial attachés doing the same thing?

Mr. KENNEDY. The difficulty is that the Department of Commerce is not given the power which it ought to be given.

Mr. WOOD. It is either given too much power or not enough power; one or the other. I agree with you on that proposition. (Hearings, pp. 2429–2430.)

Now, listen to what Mr. Kennedy says in reference to cooperation with the State Department:

Mr. WOOD. There is one thing that is occurring, and that is when something comes along that you think had better be left to the exercise of your good judgment, out of deference to the State Department and out of deference to the fact that they are looked upon as being the representatives of the Government more directly than your department, you simply put your ideas under the bushel and they are kept there, which shows there is no cooperation between your department and the State Department.

Mr. KENNEDY. In regard to cooperation, we have made a very sincere effort to knit our service in with the service of the Department of State, so there would be no duplication. We have sent out instructions to this effect to our representatives. When I was stationed in Australia I went over this matter with the consul general in Sydney, and he said, "There are a great many instructions here which say that the commercial attaché shall not conflict with the consul, but there are no instructions that the consul shall not conflict with the commercial attaché." On our part we have sent all these instructions and have done it very carefully, and I may say that so far as conferences with the State Department go, looking toward better cooperation, we have held ourselves in readiness at all times. I have talked with Mr. Carr, who is Director of the Consular Service, and told him if there was ever any question of our service not knitting together I should be very glad to talk it over with him. He has never called upon me to talk it over or suggested a conference.

Mr. WOOD. That is just the trouble.

Mr. KENNEDY. The willingness exists on our part. We have been very anxious and very willing to meet them more than halfway, and I think we have. Now, with regard to policy, the commercial attachés, being in the embassy, are very frequently called upon by the ambassador to advise him on questions of commercial policy. That is true at almost all our posts. I have many evidences of it. We could give you letters of that kind. We have a letter from Ambassador Willard complimenting the work of Commercial Attaché Jones, at Madrid. We had a letter from Mr. Garrett, at The Hague, referring to Commercial Attaché Edwards, and we have letters from various people showing that our commercial attachés are giving a good deal of time to commercial policy work. I fear that some consuls as State Department officials do not altogether like the fact that these representatives of the Department of Commerce are in this position of commercial advisers to the ambassador. It is not because these men are commerce representatives particularly, but it is because they are men of such training and experience and have such contact with the business community that they are advisers. Mr. Morgan, the ambassador to Rio, is on his way to the United States. In leaving his post he has requested the commercial attaché to carry on certain important functions of the embassy, and he has used him constantly in dealing with the ministry of commerce. That is true of most of the posts. Apart from our men doing this work in a spirit of helpfulness, at many embassies and legations our men get up the economic review of the week which the State Department cables through about commercial conditions.

We are constantly doing things to help them. We are in the same mood and have the same attitude here in Washington. Very frequently we do get together and consult together on questions of commercial policy, but very often it is a question of courtesy on the part of the State Department. They take it up with us provided they feel they wish to do so, but they are under no obligations to do so. The Secretary of Commerce, the official in the Cabinet who is responsible for the promotion of the foreign commerce of the country, may not necessarily be called upon. It is a question of courtesy whether he is called upon in connection with the important questions of commercial policy which confront this country. Secretary Alexander told me personally that he looked upon this question of promoting our foreign commerce as the most important feature of his work in the Department of Commerce. I am sorry he is away, and I think before you come to any decision you ought to have his personal feelings. He has set his heart on this as an important feature of his work. It is unfortunate that a situation should exist where he does not automatically have the ability to voice his views on certain subjects of commercial policy and then hold himself responsible to the country for those views; just the same way as the Secretary of the Treasury holds himself responsible to the country for his views on foreign finance.

Mr. WOOD. I agree with you exactly with reference to this matter and the Congress of the United States is responsible to the country for curing the ills that you admit exist here. Now, what we want to get at is the best way to do it. There can be no question about the fact that they do exist and that they are inimical to the best interests of the country. There is very much evidence of the very thing you are talking about here, although you are generous enough to shield it, and I admire you for it, but it is perfectly patent and it is the duty of the Congress, knowing these things to be true, to remedy them if a remedy can be found. (Hearings, pp. 2435–2437.)

On the necessity of fixing responsibility and supervision of representatives abroad, Mr. Kennedy has this to say:

Mr. SISSON. I understand the diplomatic side of this question contend that the commercial attaché is seeking some recognition, so that he will be received better when he comes from the Department of State than when he comes from the Department of Commerce. Of course, to the American mind that is the height of silliness and folly, but they say that is not true in European countries, and for that reason that excrescence has to be there in their department.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Kennedy ought to be able to tell you about that, because he has had personal experience with that.

Mr. KENNEDY. The State Department, of course, accredits commercial attachés, and I think all of our representatives abroad ought to be brought under the responsibility and supervision of the chief of the mission abroad; that is, there ought to be a unity and the ambassador ought not to be afraid some one might make a statement or make a speech or say something that will embarrass him. We have sent out circulars of instruction to our foreign representatives. Our trade commissioners are introduced by the commercial attachés, who have the authority of the ambassador to do that. The State Department accredits the commercial attaché; that is, they inform the foreign Government that he is commercial attaché to the embassy.

Mr. SISSON. That means he is an official of the United States Government?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes. They do the same thing for the military and naval attachés. The reason they are perhaps reluctant to continue to accredit commercial attachés is because certain people in the State Department have felt the commercial attachés were taking away some of their functions. Now, I think it is a very important thing that this question should be settled definitely. The commercial attachés and other foreign representatives of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce wish to cooperate, yet they feel that there is a certain inclination on the part of many officials in the State Department service to feel that they do not really "belong"—that they are intruders. Naturally, there is not quite the spirit of team play and get together that there would be if this question were settled definitely. As long as there is any feeling that the State Department may be able to take away the commercial attachés or perhaps take away the entire Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce and the thing is not decided, the representatives of the Department of Commerce, in a sense, are on the outside. And the commercial problems at the present time abroad are exceedingly difficult. A man who is endeavoring to grasp the commercial situation in any European country to-day is working under a very great strain, and he needs to have all the encouragement, all the friendly cooperation that it is possible to get, and I heartily indorse what you are trying to do here from a standpoint of the spirit and morale of the service. We have to get together, we have to have team play, or the best interests of the country will suffer. We can not have part of the men feeling that the other half, belonging to the other department, are trying to eliminate them. Now, I would like to ask a question here which I think is quite vital. The character of the argument that I wish to present as director of the bureau is affected by the proposition that is up. Is this proposal we are discussing to drop the commercial attaché service entirely or to add it to the State Department?

Mr. WOOD. Of course, that is a matter of detail.

Mr. SISSON. The only thing we could do, Mr. Chairman, would be to drop it entirely here, because we could not legislate in this bill to transfer this service anywhere else. And the only reason we should drop it here is because it would reduce the expenses on the face of this bill.

Mr. WOOD. That would bring to a focus the settlement of the very question you have in mind; and unless something is done it will run along for years, like it has in the past, with this divided responsibility. (Hearings, 2442–2443.)

Mr. Sweet, also from the Department of Commerce, also a partisan in so far as his department is concerned, admitted and emphasized the very fact that was testified to by Mr. Kennedy with reference to the duplication of effort, with reference to this divided responsibility and the ineffectiveness that was produced thereby. Hear what he says in addition to quotation from him heretofore made:

I want to say, also, with regard to duplication that the duplication I referred to was with regard to the control of a business or a bureau or any part of the work of the Government, and such dividing of responsibility and authority I regard as a very great mistake. I think this whole work should be centralized in some one particular department and under one particular man. (Hearings, p. 2435.)

I wish to call attention now to some evidence on the other side of the question. I have this word from a man who served for more than a quarter of a century in the Consular Service. He was interested in the extension of our foreign trade. He is no longer connected with the Government, he has quit his position, and has only the desire that should obtain with all of the rest of us—to have that done which is best for this country of ours, so far as its trade is concerned. This is what he says:

It is reported by newspapers that a protest is being made by business men against the elimination by Congress of commercial attachés from the appropriation estimates. It should not be hard to answer such protests, as the question is not at all one of cutting down foreign-trade appropriations but is one of allotting such appropriatiaons to a single agency rather than largely wasting them, as is the case at the present time, between two services which overlap. It is unfortunate that the trade organizations and business men of the United States have been wholly misled by persistent newspaper campaign and speeches at trade conventions, covering a period of several years, recounting the achievements of the commercial-attaché system, when as a matter of fact persons living abroad have known such achievements to be principally imaginary. The official biographies of the commercial attachés themselves indicate that their entire history has been one of conspicuous commercial inexperience prior to appointment and after brief service such frequent resignations as to render impossible their usefulness. But few, if any, of the original 18 appointees remain in the service. American business men, if they understood the present hopeless duplication of duties, would be the last of all persons to allow a continuation of the expenditure of funds of a Nation which is already overtaxed for the maintenance of two expensive cooperating official agencies abroad for performing a single set of duties. It is therefore vitally important to the future foreign trade of the United States that a permanent decision be made by Congress now as to which of the two services should be done away with as superfluous, and thus releasing appropriations sufficient for the efficient maintenance of the other. The entire unbusinesslike system is well illustrated with a commercial attaché, two trade commissioners, a consulate general, and an embassy at Buenos Aires, Argentina, all of which are at the present time performing the same commercial duties. If but a fraction of the appropriations now estimated for the ever-changing commercial-attaché system would be granted to our permanent Consular Service for the purpose of trade promotion, no fear need be expressed by American business men and our Congress for the welfare of our foreign commerce.

I desire to call attention now to another bit of evidence. These bits of evidence come from men of long years of experience, who, as I say, are no longer interested by reason of their connection with the department, and have but one purpose to serve, and that is to see that we get something for our money.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to get the name of the gentleman who wrote the letter that was just read.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. His letter was written in a more or less confidential way, and I do not feel at liberty to give his name without his consent.

Mr. MADDEN. Then his evidence is not any good.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am quite sure the gentleman would not say that if the name was disclosed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Has the gentleman the indorsement of any association of commerce in the United States in favor of his position?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I have not; and here is the trouble. The chambers of commerce do not know existing conditions. I do not believe that the chambers of commerce of this country would want this duplication to exist. They are composed largely of business men, and I believe if they knew of this duplication they would not be in favor of it. If their business was conducted in the same manner as this business is being conducted, if they had this constant friction that comes by reason of divided responsibility, if they found two agents of theirs working at cross purposes in the same field, does anyone think they would permit it to exist for one moment? I have the same abiding confidence in the business men of this country that I have always had, and I believe when the facts become known they will demand that this evil be remedied.

Mr. OLIVER. There are a number of splendid business men in the House who have heard the gentleman's argument.

Does he know of any one of them who will agree with the gentleman after hearing him?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know whether any one of them will or not. I am bringing this testimony to you, gentlemen. I do not see why you should shut your eyes and your ears to it. Read the hearings in this matter, coming from both the State Department and the Department of Commerce, of which a great majority here seem to be champions. They admit this thing should be remedied. Mr. Sweet was just as loud in his declaration with reference to the eradication of this evil as he was with reference to this service being entirely in the Department of Commerce, and Mr. Kennedy was likewise emphatic as to the necessity of remedying it.

I wish now to call your attention to another bit of evidence. This is an extract from a letter of a member of the United States Consular Service formerly stationed in Latin America, written to a Member of Congress, on or about July 1, 1919:

All this brings me down to the point of saying that without foreign trade we shall not need any merchant marine, and the further fact that I have no doubt your committee is about to have tons of academic information dumped upon it from various Government agencies. It would appear to me that the Department of Commerce, the Shipping Board, the State Department, and in some ways the Navy Department, are occupied in gathering data, each independent of the other. I do not feel at liberty to go into the detail that I would if I could talk with you, relative to the manner in which much of this data is being gathered, for fear of creating a wrong impression without wishing to do so. The data of these various agencies will be largely overlapping and much of it obtained by snap judgment of people without experience in strange lands. There is other of it that is reliable, and it seems a pity that you must have the task of prying into the methods by which the information is obtained in order to sort the wheat from the tares; but you must if you wish the straight goods—that is flat. It is also a pity that sufficient money can not be given to the Consular Service to let them make the needed investigations, as they are the only foreign service well organized and with sufficient permanency abroad to understand local conditions.

The Consular Service is in daily contact with the principal business of the community where they are and know what they are thinking and doing. People traveling on special commissions for a few days do not know who they are talking with, get only a superficial view of things, and many times their information is the offhand views of the consular representatives without any special study given to the subject.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman give the name of the person who wrote that letter?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I can not do that, because it is a personal letter addressed to another Congressman and myself.

Mr. BRITTEN. Without any desire to be disrespectful, I would say now, without knowing the name of the gentleman, that he is not a business man.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I expect that he is just as much a business man as some of these gentlemen who are criticizing him.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman has been quoting Mr. Kennedy, of the Commerce Department, several times, leaving the inference that he was in favor of this cut. I would like to state that Mr. Kennedy was summoned before us, and his whole testimony is against the elimination of these commercial attachés.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, I did not say anything of the kind, and I do not wish the gentleman to misunderstand me. If his ears were as open to the facts that I am trying to bring to the House as they should be he would have understood me and what I said. Mr. Kennedy said that there was this duplication; that there was this overlapping; that it was detrimental to the service, and he said it should be terminated and these activities should be gotten together under one responsible head. But he did not ask that this be reduced, but, on the other hand, he asked that it be increased.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Did not Mr. Kennedy also say that this service of commercial attachés was not a duplication to any considerable extent?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. He did not, and if you will take and examine his testimony as given to us in the hearing you will know that he did not.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It was set out the other day.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, my only purpose, and I think the only purpose of the majority of the committee, not only of the subcommittee but of the whole committee, in bringing this information to this House is that we may provide a remedy for the evils that are so apparent in our foreign trade service. I will feel well repaid for all my efforts because of the resultant good I know will accrue to the business interests of our country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on this amendment.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all Members of the House have three legislative days——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to these several requests? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. SIEGEL. I ask to extend my remarks.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 210, noes 39.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses, including field investigations in the United States and abroad, purchase of documents, plans, specifications, manuscripts, and all other publications for the promotion of the commercial interests of the United States, exchange on official checks, and rent outside the District of Columbia, to further promote and develop the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, $175,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That not more than $63,000 of the foregoing sum shall be used for the expenses of branch offices in the United States.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in line 3 by striking out the figures "$175,000" and inserting "$325,000," which is now carried in the current law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SISSON: Page 128, line 3, strike out "$175,000" and insert "$325,000."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Why is that?

Mr. SISSON. The present law carries $325,000, out of which are paid various services of the commercial agents in connection with commercial attachés. In other words, there are certain men who are skilled, we will say, in the shoe industry or in the textile industry. These men with this special training are in the foreign field developing the foreign trade, and when you cut this $325,000 down to $175,000 you seriously cripple this force in the foreign field.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, this item may have been used for salaries, I do not know; but that was not the purpose of it. It was for certain expenses. The salaries of these commercial agents are carried in the next two items in the bill. Now, I do not know whether they need $175,000 or $325,000 for the purposes named in this paragraph, which includes exchange on official checks. I should not think that they would have much trouble about exchange on foreign checks at this time, when you can buy exchange for much less than its value abroad. But what is this money used for, something that is not denominated in the bond?

Mr. SISSON. No. This money is used for the purpose which I just stated.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is, the purchase of documents?

Mr. SISSON. There are some men engaged in getting this information and in giving it to the trade. Now, the Department of Commerce asked for a great deal more money than this amount, but I am only asking for the amount in the current law. I am not trying to increase it, but I do not think we ought to reduce it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know what they use the money for. Nobody can tell from an appropriation bill any longer what a department uses money for, but this appropriation is made to pay necessary expenses, including the purchase of documents, plans and specifications, manuscripts, publications for the promotion of commercial interests, exchange on official checks, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and so forth. Now, it never was intended to be used to hire agents abroad. Whether it is used for that purpose or not I do not know. We carry two paragraphs in this bill to employ special agents abroad and one to employ commercial attachés. If we have been worked by the Government, I want to know it; that is all.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think you have.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How can they use $175,000 for buying plans and specifications and purchasing documents and paying exchange?

Mr. SISSON. They do not do that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What do they do with it?

Mr. SISSON. They employ commercial agents, who work up the business and also get information; they have to have the blanks and the necessary money to give this information to the trade; but this is a small item. The hearings were quite extensive on this activity and show the value of the commercial agents employed under this item.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, $175,000 would print a good deal. They have a printing fund besides that.

Mr. SISSON. It is not a question of printing at all.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman said blanks, and so forth, for giving information to the trade.

Mr. SISSON. You have got to have some one to get the information before you get to the blank end of it. The blanks are a mere incident.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This appropriation was not supposed to pay men.

Mr. SISSON. It does pay men, however.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is another thing, then. That is what I have been trying to find out.

Mr. SISSON. I said at the very beginning that that was true, and that men were employed and salaries paid out of this fund.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I did not so understand you. That is not what the item says it is for.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If we may continue this, I want to get the information.

We provide in this bill $100,000 for appointing special agents to South America; $50,000 now—it used to be $100,000—for special agents in the Orient. A few years ago we included an item in this bill for commercial attachés, mainly for the purpose of sending them to Europe. Now, do I understand that the department, having secured an appropriation to pay necessary expenses to buy documents, and so forth, is using that to employ an additional set of commercial agents abroad?

Mr. SISSON. Now, it does not matter what you call them. whether commercial agents——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not care what you call them.

Mr. SISSON. But they are men, simply men, employed in this service.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If they are not commercial agents, they have no place in this bill at all.

Mr. SISSON. It may be true that they ought not to be here, but, as a matter of fact, this is the fund out of which they pay these men who do this part of the work. If they ought not to be here, the gentleman can make a point of order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What do they do?

Mr. SISSON. They do the work of any commercial agent by going directly to the various countries and ascertaining what they need, and giving the information to the various manufacturers throughout the United States. The blanks are used for this. so the blanks do not amount to much.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Has that anything to do with the tariff provisions?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is information I am trying to get, not a suggestion.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is what I hope to give the gentleman.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the gentleman has information, I yield to him, but not for a suggestion.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If I understand the gentleman aright, he is inquiring what the $162,000 is for.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; I am not. There is no $162,000 involved in the item at all.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Then the gentleman will excuse me for interrupting him.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am referring to the item at the bottom of the page.

Mr. KITCHIN. Do they not pay those 90 commissioners from that fund? There are about 12 attachés, as I understand, and about 90 or 100 commissioners.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They are not supposed to be paid out of this fund. The Lord only knows. I am trying to get information, and the committee, it seems, has not got it, and I will abandon the effort. It is easy to increase an appropriation, but it is very difficult at times to get information from one of these departments.

Mr. SISSON. In addition to that, the gentleman will find that all of these field investigators go out and ascertain the proper fields and the proper avenues for business, and after they get this information it is sent back to the Department of Commerce, and the Secretary of Commerce in turn puts it in the hands of the trade. This service is as good as anything in the Department of Commerce.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If this is to pay field investigators, they ought to say so. It does not say so at all. It says for pay of "all necessary expenses."

Mr. SISSON. It says plainly:

For all necessary expenses, including field investigations in the United States and abroad.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly to pay expenses, ordinarily, has never been supposed to include salaries of agents or otherwise.

Mr. SISSON. Whatever might have been the original intention under this language, they are now doing exactly that thing, paying the expenses, including field investigations in the United States and abroad, and under that languge they send these men abroad to make the field investigations, and they are men who are paid good salaries.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What does this mean, besides what the commercial agents and consuls do? As I understand, we have three sets of commercial agents in Europe. One are the consuls, and one are the commercial attachés, and another set are called "field investigators." Is that correct?

Mr. SISSON. That is my understanding. They have the expert attachés, and they have these field investigators, who are called "trade commissioners," I believe; and these are the men that go and get the information, not confined to the town or the immediate locality in which we may have a consular office, where the commercial attaché is, but he goes out to the various cities and business centers.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is what the commercial attaché does.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. KITCHIN. Under this Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce they have now 12 commercial attachés to embassies?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; 12.

Mr. KITCHIN. They are in the capitals of 12 different countries.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. At what salaries?

Mr. KITCHIN. As to that I do not know; but under these there are from 90 to 100 men who are called "trade commissioners," and they are practical men, who go through these different countries, looking into the export or import of leather, for example, and they report from the country in which they are located all statistics regarding leather and the leather industry, where an American can import or export leather.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Are these 90 or 100 commissioners paid out of this fund?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. It ought to say so.

Mr. SISSON. They are paid out of this fund.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Ah, that is what I have been seeking. Why try to hide it?

Mr. SISSON. Instead of leather I used shoes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman did use his shoes, but he did not mention leather.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Illinois was not attentive to what I said. I used the exact expression.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I always listen to the gentleman, whether he is using his shoes or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. I endeavored to make as clear as I could that it was these men who were selected for special fitness. The stenographer's notes will show that in the beginning I told the gentleman that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This bill ought not to be drawn in such a way as to hide this information.

Mr. SISSON. I did not draw it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The department did.

Mr. SISSON. My understanding is that the gentleman from Illinois drew the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The department drew this item.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the committee for just a moment, perhaps I can give a little information on this proposition.

This is just one of many examples of the abuse of lump-sum appropriations to these different bureaus without any specifications in regard to their use. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is correct with reference to the use of this. There is not any considerable portion of it used for the purposes enumerated in the item. It is used for the purpose of paying salaries to these so-called experts. They have them under various names. They call some of them trade commissioners resident——

Mr. MADDEN. Is that the appropriation the gentleman is talking about?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. Some are called trade commissioners, some are called commodity investigators, and then they have commercial agents and the Lord only knows what all.

Now, I want to call the attention of gentlemen to this proposition: Under this item, before we got into the war, when, I presume, we were doing our very level best to extend our trade, or to look after it in Europe, we were expending $75,000. That was the maximum that was appropriated for this item. During the war, when it was represented to the committee that because of the war we needed more representatives over there because their duties were so hard to perform, this item was increased for the exigencies of the war to $125,000. We had a right to suppose, and many of us did suppose, that with the termination of the war we could at least go back somewhere near where we were before; but lo and behold, instead of that the amount was increased by the last appropriation bill from $125,000 to $325,000, and in this appropriation they ask that the amount be increased to $500,000, or more than six times what it was before the war. To my mind, gentlemen, this appropriation that we have given here of $175,000 is quite sufficient under present conditions in Europe.

Here is one thing that we should take into consideration: Without any desire to cripple any business or industry of this country, we ought to look a little bit to the interests of those at home. We are to-day carrying 90 per cent of the credit load of the world. All of the money that is being paid to American manufacturers or to the sellers of American produce is being paid out of American funds, and the extraordinary exportation that is being made is being made because they are paying us not their money but our money, which is making the cost of living mount higher and higher in this country of ours. The masses of our own people need a little bit of attention, and this department can get along full well with $175,000 during the coming year until there is a more settled condition abroad. There is no money on the face of the earth except the money of the United States that is hardly worth carrying around. The English pound is down to $3.19, the German mark is quoted at a measly cent, and the French franc is worth less than one-half of its face value. So I say we had better look a little bit to the interests of the men who have to feed the hungry mouths of our own country and not be expending too much money in this way, for every dollar's worth of produce that we are now exporting is increasing the cost of living in the United States. I say that the amount appropriated in this bill is amply sufficient. Seventy-five thousand dollars was plenty before we got into the war, when there was peace and when business was running under normal conditions. Now, after the war, when these unsettled conditions are prevailing, with prices uncertain as they are, with the cost of living mounting higher and higher all the while, we should be a little careful before we are so extravagant in making the appropriation asked for by this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be adopted. [Applause.] The amendment carries no more than was provided by Congress for the current fiscal year. It does not represent a single dollar of increase in the appropriation. Now, gentlemen, Great Britain, as I am informed, is spending more than twice as much as was spent before the war for the promotion and development of her foreign commerce.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman realizes, of course, that we have an unparalleled opportunity to capture foreign trade; that if we capture it and take care of it we will be apt to hold it; and that now, instead of retrenching for this purpose, it is the time when we should expand reasonably in order to get the trade of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is entirely correct, and the force of his statement is shown by the fact that every other country that is seeking to capture foreign trade, even though they have an indebtedness larger than our rich country, is greatly increasing its appropriations for this purpose. As I have stated, Great Britain has increased her appropriation, and is now carrying for this purpose $1,450,320, while this bill seeks to reduce our appropriation to $487,670. France, with nowhere near the resources or riches of our country, and which has no such possibilities as our country so far as business and manufactures are concerned, appropriates $852,000.

Since the war France has established 13 new attaché or commercial posts in various parts of the world for the development of her foreign trade. Japan is spending $505,000, and I understand is shortly to have an attaché stationed in New York City.

As the gentleman from New York so forcibly says, if we do not capture this trade now, if we permit other countries to capture it, it will be lost forever to the United States. This is the time of all times when the United States Government should expend a reasonable sum for the advancement of our foreign commerce.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman gave the figures spent in foreign countries as compared with the amount spent here. This is not all the money that is expended for this purpose. You take all the sources expended for the purpose and it amounts to more than $4,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We are spending some money for ambassadors and the Consular Service.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But I mean outside of that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Here is a service designed originally by Congress for the sole purpose of developing the commercial interests of our country——

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. BEE. May I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that to-day in Mexico the English Government is sending its commercial commissioners in there, and they are extending credits to those merchants from six to nine months to capture trade that properly belongs to the United States if we but had representatives there?

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. We have just adopted an amendment providing for commercial attachés. What good is that unless we pass this amendment to pay for the 80 or 90 men that work under them?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Absolutely none, because this money is to be used to employ trade agents and trade commissioners who have no fixed status, who travel from point to point in countries to which they are assigned investigating commercial conditions and opportunities, and as the gentleman from North Carolina says, the attachés are unnecessary unless you make this appropriation, for these agents are, in a sense, under them and supplement their work by specializing in various industries.

Mr. EMERSON. Is this the fund expended by the Department of Commerce? I want to say that the chamber of commerce in my town has unanimously indorsed it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is indorsed by all the chambers of commerce in the country and the entire business interests. This appropriation is in the interest of all classes in this country, for everyone is interested in the development of our resources and the increase of our wealth by the extension of our trade.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I will detain the committee but a moment. I am tremendously interested in this question, because I live next to the Mexican border. Let me appeal to you men who represent the great manufacturing interests of this section, whose business may be extended into Mexico if you can separate in that unhappy and distracted country the dealings of American merchants and manufacturers from the dealings of the diplomatic corps.

The diplomatic corps, by reason of the unhappy relations existing between this Republic and that country, is constantly in a position of friction. But if you have these commercial attachés—these commercial missionaries—representing the United States, who will gather statistics and bring the business to the knowledge of the manufacturer and the great commercial interests of this Nation, instead of our business amounting to $217,000,000, as it was last year, we ought to do a business of $1,000,000,000. And let me say to you that nothing will go further to restore the friendly relations of these two peoples than the extension of the commercial relations between them and the knowledge that the people of this country are not seeking to bring peace in Mexico by bullets, but are seeking to bring it by the restoration of commercial relations with the people, bringing those things that they have not and taking from them things that we have not. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. It is rather a striking observation that the work done by the diplomats would be confusing and ought to be done by the business men.

Mr. BEE. Absolutely.

Mr. FESS. I should think it would be right the other way.

Mr. BEE. The gentleman from Ohio misunderstands the situation. When you go into Mexico there is not a bureau of the State Department that is not called upon almost daily to send an ultimatum in reference to an assault on some individual American citizen. That raises a spirit of resentment in that country against the department. That condition will be changed when you put the commercial commissioners there, as England and France have done to take the business away from the United States, while we are quibbling over whether we will pay $100,000 or $116,000 to build up a great trade with this country.

Mr. FESS. Why not abolish diplomatic relations and use the business relations?

Mr. BEE. Oh, the gentleman well knows that we can not abolish the diplomatic relations and maintain a free and independent Government, and such a question from a man of his distinction and ability certainly reflects no credit upon him in the course of this discussion.

Mr. FESS. It certainly does. The diplomatic relations are due to the confusion of the diplomats.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. In connection with what the gentleman has said, I wonder if the gentleman happens to remember that George Washington in his Farewell Address, which was read here a few days ago, warned us that the greatest part of our policy should be that in extending our foreign trade we should keep just as far afield of politics as possible? [Applause.]

Mr. BEE. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. And George Washington was a very wise man.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEE. I do not mean to be disrespectful to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], but I differ with him on this matter. Let me say again to this House: The great virgin field of Mexico lies at our doors untouched, and this appropriation, carrying out an expansion of this trade, will bring the business and prosperity to those people that they desire and the commercial relations that will enable those who represent the manufacturing districts to assist in building up the country by sending commerce into it and enabling American money to develop its resources. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas has just told us how we can increase American trade in Mexico. He has told us of the deplorable condition of that country and also of the failure of our diplomacy in treating with that country, with its deplorable effects upon our business interests in Mexico. The remedy, however, is not the appointment of 100 or more commercial attachés to represent the Commerce Department in Mexico. The cause is too deep to be corrected by that mild remedy. The remedy is to oust the administration which is responsible for the present chaotic state of affairs with Mexico. That remedy the people will apply next November.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota does not deem it necessary, in order to discuss a great commercial question, to run politics into it for the purpose of defeating the passage of these amendments, because, let me say to him, that while he may know all about the Canadian border, he is as far removed from Mexico as I am from the Canadian border. I have spent my life among those people, and when I say to you that we now have the opportunity to open a great commercial field, and when I make this plea I care not who is the President of the United States or who controls Congress. I am speaking as an American and not as a partisan. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And let me remind the gentleman from Texas that when I interjected my remarks I, too, spoke as an American. The gentleman asks for different commercial relations with Mexico. I ask for different commercial relations with Mexico. As to that we are agreed. But we can not obtain them until we clean out the administration responsible for these relations.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up the time of the House, but do wish to call attention to the fact that this is, of all times, the time when all of these items ought to be maintained and kept up as large as they were last year. The chairman of the committee has called attention to the fact that these appropriations were made larger last year because of war conditions. It seems to me that because of peace conditions they ought to be made even larger. [Applause.] In any event, surely they ought to be maintained to the same standard as they were in last year's bill, and I hope they will be by the adoption of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Indiana said he was going to rise.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Just as soon as we finish this item. We are nearly through now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To further promote and develop the commerce of the United States with the Far East, including the employment of experts and special agents in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase of books of reference and periodicals, reports, traveling and subsistence expenses of officers and employees, exchange on official checks, and all other necessary incidental expenses not included in the foregoing, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, $50,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 12610, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California presents a conference report on a bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Military Academy appropriation bill, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and to agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Military Academy appropriation bill, to disagree to all Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from California if the Senate reinserted the provision in reference to the construction of the hotel at West Point?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; they inserted a provision for the hotel.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I object for the present.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the proceedings under the Calendar Wednesday call for to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to dispense with proceedings under the call for Calendar Wednesday to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a brief statement prepared by Mr. Russell on the decimal system of weights and measures.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement prepared by Mr. Russell on the decimal system. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his objection. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the business of Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chairs hears none, and it is so ordered.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from California.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to take from the table the Military Academy appropriation bill, to disagree to all Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair appoints the following conferees: Mr. KAHN, Mr. MORIN, and Mr. WISE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Wednesday, March 3, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under House resolution 470, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 274) in the promotion of the general welfare to provide capital for the development by land colonization of the agricultural resources of the Nation, providing certain privileges to soldier settlers, and creating a national colonization board; Committee on Appropriations discharged, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

A bill (H. Res. 168) to provide for the sale to private interests of ships owned by the Government through the United States Shipping Board, and for the ownership and operation of such ships under the American flag, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas in the present legislative situation the United States Shipping Board is in an embarrassing uncertainty as to its powers and policies for the sale of merchant-marine shipping to private interests; and

Whereas continuance of the Government in private business enterprise means continuance of a large proportion of the great burden on the taxpayers of the country, without compensating profit; and

Whereas continuance of the Government in possession and control of the American merchant marine beyond a time required for the disposal of such ships to the best advantage would strengthen any tendency to adopt a policy of Government ownership; and

Whereas the ships now owned through the Shipping Board will progressively deteriorate in value, so that possible profit in their sale might be precluded: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Shipping Board herewith shall take steps to sell to the best possible advantage all vessels now under its ownership; and be it

Resolved further, That the Shipping Board in its efforts to sell such ships shall have the power to reject any or all bids and in other ways to act on its own judgment and discretion; and be it

Resolved further, That in the sale of such ships every possible legal requirement shall be made that the ships shall be owned and operated under the American flag, and the Shipping Board shall recommend to the Congress any legislation that it may deem necessary to assure such American ownership and operation.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have introduced the joint resolution at this time because I think all will agree that it relates to a subject which should receive very quick consideration by this body and by the other House of Congress. A bill is already pending directing that the seized German ships be reconditioned by the Shipping Board and not sold until further action by Congress. My object in introducing the joint resolution, which plainly takes the other side of the proposition, is to offer it at the proper time, possibly as a substitute for the bill which is now pending.

I have introduced the joint resolution, Mr. President, for the purpose of terminating as rapidly as possible the Government's administration of private business, and in so doing, in my judgment, to lessen the burden of taxation upon the people and to encourage a return of normal conditions.

I fully recognize the significance of the agitation of a few days ago, when it seemed that there was almost a universal demand upon the part of the general public that the ships formerly owned by Germany which we received through the war should not be sold; but I feel positive, in the light of what has since happened and the information we have since received, that that sentiment was based to a large extent on a misconception of the conditions and possibly on false premises.

I hope the Senate will give me its indulgence for about five minutes, in order that I may explain my reasons for the introduction of the joint resolution, because I think those reasons should be presented at the time of its introduction.

The Government can not conduct successfully a business enterprise, in my judgment, unless it adopts business principles. Business success requires that business shall show a profit in its ordinary administration without having an inexhaustible fund like the Treasury of the United States to fall back upon to make up deficits. Therefore if we are to conduct business to great extent in competition with the private business interests of the country already in the shipping business we must conduct it along fair lines of competition. We know perfectly well that in the administering of the shipping business of the country the carrying rates have been raised, as has been brought out here on several occasions, in some cases as high as 1,000 per cent, I am informed.

It is perfectly easy to make a profit where there is absolutely no limit to the amount to be charged, and, of course, we know that the consumer finally pays the bill. The profit is not a real one when the consumer is so overcharged, and without any appeal because the Government has established the rate.

Again, to-day, with the ships already delivered, or soon to be delivered, we occupy an advantageous position, if we are ever going to close out the business of Government ownership. We can, in other words, give spot delivery; and our ships are worth more to-day—common sense must demonstrate that—than they will be six months or a year from now, because practically all the shipyards have received large orders from private interests, and those ships will be delivered from 6 to 12 months hence. Most naturally our ships will depreciate in value, and semi-obsolete ships will bring far less than modern, up-to-date vessels.

Anyone who believes fundamentally in governmental ownership or governmental administration of business would naturally and properly be opposed to this joint resolution, but if he does not believe in that policy, then, it seems to me, it is the duty of Congress, if a majority believe that the Government should get out of business, to delegate the authority to some one to sell the ships in a businesslike manner, including the right to reject all bids and to readvertise in order to get the highest possible prices, a right which all other public bodies have, and to be in a position to dispose of the ships along such lines as will enable us to close out the business, as our continuation in which, in my judgment, will continue to show a deficit to the taxpayers of the country, if a proper system of bookkeeping is maintained.

Three billions of dollars of the people's money is tied up in the merchant marine; estimate that we get as much as one and a half billions out of it, and one easily can figure the great lightening of the taxation burden, the tremendous saving in interest on this sum, and the return of that proportion of the principal, now unprofitably invested. Such departures were necessary in times of war, but now we are facing the problems of returning to the basis of peace.

We can not reduce taxation unless we either reduce expenses or cash in war investments.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield for a suggestion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KING. I wish to make a suggestion in line with the Senator's argument, if he will permit me to do so.

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. One of the contentions now being made by some of the shipowners is that they would like the Government to continue the operation of the ships for the reason that because of the inefficiency and extravagance of the Government it will be compelled to charge very high prices for freight and passenger service, and therefore it will enable them to maintain higher levels of prices and thus make larger profits.

Mr. EDGE. I thank the Senator from Utah for his suggestion.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to remark, for the RECORD, that I regard the suggestion as disingenuous.

Mr. EDGE. At the present time the bill pending refers primarily or exclusively to the sale of the German passenger ships. We have already sold a number of ex-German cargo ships. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a communication which was received a few days ago from the President of the United States in which was set forth the fact that he had made a tentative arrangement with the premier of Great Britain, which provided that the United States could only retain an amount from the sale of German ships equal to our losses in the submarine warfare and that all money received in excess of the total of those losses would be paid into the reparation fund, to be distributed among the creditors of Germany. If that arrangement should be acquiesced in by Congress it would simply mean that the money we receive for the German ships over and above our losses by submarines, which were comparatively small, would be turned over to Great Britain, France, and other countries.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire, with the Senator's permission, to ask him a question. I am inclined to think the Senator is mistaken in the view he has stated; and I wish to ask him if he does not think that the value that we shall have to account for for these ships will be the value of the ships at the time we took them over rather than the value at any future time by reason of any improvements we may make; or, in other words, will we not have to account under the agreement, if we should ratify it, only for the value of the ships at the time we took them over? It seems to me that that is the value we would have to account for, and that we would have to do that whether we improve the ships or whether we do not.

Mr. EDGE. In answer to the Senator from Washington I will say he may be correct, but it does not greatly change the situation. I shall only read the paragraph of the agreement tentatively entered into, the fourth section of which provides:

> That where the valuation of such retained tonnage, specifically in the case of Brazil, China, Cuba, Siam, and the United States, exceeds the value of tonnage lost during the war, a reasonable value for such excess shall be determined and that amount paid by the holder State to the reparations commission "for the credit of Germany toward the sums due from her for reparation in respect to war losses of merchant ships."

I will not attempt to give that language a legal interpretation, although it seems pretty clear to us.

I have only this final observation to make: If we recondition those ships, as provided for in a pending bill, we are told by the chairman of the Shipping Board that it will require $75,000,000 to do so. I do not think those figures are generally disputed. The ships are now from 6 to 12 to 20 years old. Understand, they are passenger ships, not cargo ships, and our merchant-marine necessity was primarily for cargo ships. The only experience we have had operating passenger ships has shown a loss. It will require from 6 to 12 months to recondition those ships. The testimony before the Commerce Committee and that which has generally been adduced throughout the country, I think, clearly proves that we can not receive for those ships 6 or 12 months from now the price which we can get to-day plus the amount we shall spend on their reconditioning. I know nothing as to their present value, although a naval board has stated we have been offered more than their actual worth. It is simply a case, as the business man puts it, of sending good money after bad. If we intend to give up operating a merchant marine and turn it back to the business acumen of the country, under proper Government regulation, we certainly shall not be justified in appropriating $75,000,000 on a chance, possibly, of getting it back 6 or 12 months from to-day.

Personally I feel that this is such an important question, in view of conditions that have arisen since the discussion as to the sale of the German ships and the facts that have been brought out by statements direct from the Shipping Board, that it is our duty to quickly establish a definite policy. The hands of the Shipping Board are tied; they do not know what they can do. Our ships are lessening in value, and we are asked to appropriate more money, with the result that, of course, the taxpayers must eventually pay the bill. Every additional dollar we appropriate is simply that much more encouragement for eventual Government ownership, because of the natural desire to try to get the investment back.

I think it is a question that Congress should take up very soon. I feel that we must delegate to somebody the right to carry out the details of business; Congress can not be a sales agent; and I have absolute confidence that the Shipping Board will conscientiously protect and conserve the best interests of the American people.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word, called forth by the last suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey. The Senator suggests that Congress ought to adopt a policy. There can not be any question about that, but the Senator's statement would convey the impression that the Committee on Commerce was neglecting this matter. Mr. President, that committee has been meeting every day, I think, for weeks, hearing testimony, with a view of determining and fixing a policy. It proposes to act just as promptly and just as conscientiously in the matter as it possibly can. The problem is one that can not be passed on overnight; it requires the most careful consideration; but I wish to assure the Senate and the country, so far as that is concerned, that the committee is putting forth its very best efforts toward getting the foundation for determining the proper policy, and that it will act in the matter just as quickly as it possibly can.

Mr. EDGE. I simply wish to add that I had no intention of reflecting——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I shall have to make a point of order. I do not think the introduction of a joint resolution ought to be allowed to lead to debate in the morning hour. We are still in the morning hour, are we not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are supposed to be receiving bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, as I understand the situation, my colleague asked unanimous consent to submit a statement in regard to the joint resolution, which consent was granted.

Mr. WARREN. And he submitted the statement, and debate ensued, and if it continues it will perhaps occupy all day. I wish the rule observed, so that we may go on with the morning business, and let the matter in which the Senator from New Jersey is interested come up in the regular way.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not believe it will take much more time.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will defer calling for the regular order for a moment, I simply want to say, in answer to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that I had no intention whatever of reflecting on the activities of that committee. I well know how hard they have been working, but I think it is often helpful to bring the attention of the country to a proposition of this kind, which may accelerate action not only on the part of the committee but on the part of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. LENROOT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PHELAN submitted an amendment providing for the treatment, restoration, and protection from erosion, wash, or drift, by tree planting or other methods, of deforested, burned-over, or flood-formed lands or sands lands, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 292. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point Ramon Ricardo Arias, a citizen of Panama, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9065) to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 12, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act, further insisting upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McLEAN. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and agree to the further conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. McLEAN, Mr. GRONNA, and Mr. OWEN conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 12 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.). Morning business is closed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 12046, being the deficiency appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12046) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate at any length this morning in opposition to the adoption of the report which has been submitted by the senior Senator from Wyoming. I quite agree with the action of the House in refusing to accede to the amendment tendered by the Senate wherein $3,000,000 were added to the bill for the purpose of making repairs upon war vessels. I took the position when that matter was before the Senate that the appropriation of nearly $700,000,000 for the current year for the Navy was an adequate appropriation; that out of that sum nearly $100,000,000 were available for repairs, for use upon docks and yards, and in the maintenance of vessels of the Navy. I think that there has been an improper allocation of a portion of this vast sum, so that some yards have received a larger proportion than that to which they were entitled. As a result it is possible that in some yards there may be an inadequate amount of money available for the repair of ships; but that dilemma is chargeable to the administration of the Navy Department and not to any niggardly policy upon the part of Congress.

I made the observation a few days ago, and I now repeat it, that if we were to make this appropriation asked for in this deficiency bill it would be an approval of the conduct of the department in allocating to some yards more than they were entitled to and in creating a deficit directly in the face of the statute. Therefore I shall be glad to concur in the action of the conferees in receding from the position taken by the Senate and in acceding to the position taken by the House with respect to this item.

The other item, Mr. President, which engaged the attention of the Senate yesterday afternoon was the appropriation of an additional $400,000 for the Speedway Hospital. It seems to me that the statement made by our distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who recently was Secretary of the Treasury, in which he explained the conditions under which this project was taken over and the appropriation obtained, must convince the Members of the Senate and those who are familiar with the transaction that this appropriation ought not to be made; but, in view of the fact that any further delay would embarrass materially some of the agencies of the Government and that a repudiation of the action of the conference committee with respect to this item would mean a reopening of several matters and sending the bill back to conference, I have felt that it was not wise to prolong the discussion or to further interpose obstacles to the adoption of the conference report.

However, I wish to call attention to the fact that the bill which was passed in the Sixty-fifth Congress, under date of March 3, 1919, carried an appropriation of $2,500,000 for the purchase and completion of this enterprise, but after the original estimate and original authorization of $2,500,000, upon representations being made, the amount was increased to $3,000,000, which was to be the total limit of cost. Within a short time after the appropriation of this amount a contract was tendered by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purchase of the hospital and its completion within the limit of the appropriation, to wit, $3,000,000, but those who were the vendors refused to sign the contract, and now we are confronted with a demand for $3,400,000.

The appropriation, as it passed the Senate a few days ago, carried $3,500,000, but it was reduced in conference.

I think, Mr. President, that the record of this transaction is not a very creditable one; and, if it stood alone and were here now for consideration on its merits or demerits, I should insist that the Senate vote upon the matter, and that they consider fully and carefully the entire transaction; but, as I have stated, circumstances and conditions are such as, in my opinion, not to warrant a prolongation of the controversy. I do not approve of the additional appropriation, and believe that the entire enterprise will prove not only disappointing to the Government but will in the end call for severe criticism.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I heartily concur in any effort that is made toward economy. There have been a great many speeches delivered in this body on the subject of economy. The country is very tired of the great appropriations that have been made, of the waste of money that we see on every side, and of the great burden of taxation. I would be glad to join in any effort which is made to reduce appropriations, to make the expenditures more wisely, and to live within the revenue of the Government; but I feel, Mr. President, that this effort to deprive the Navy of the necessary money to repair ships is a step in the wrong direction, and that it is false economy.

The Navy has ships in the various yards which are waiting for and in great need of repair. We have a report from the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering which shows that there are great dreadnaughts, that there are cruisers, that there are destroyers, that there are submarines, that there are ships of every type, which are now out of commission for the lack of funds. This is a very small appropriation as compared with what is really required. The estimate of the department calls for $10,314,962. This, if one will carefully study the various items, is a conservative estimate; and the amendment which has been offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] proposing that an appropriation of $3,000,000 be made to carry on this work is not at all adequate for the needs of the American Navy.

I have recently had occasion to visit one of these navy yards, and I can say from what I saw there that the conditions are lamentable. We will soon have no organization to continue this work. At the present time we have skilled mechanics of the highest type, and other yard employees, laborers, who can be continued in the service by making this appropriation. The failure to appropriate will lead to serious consequences. The regular appropriation bill for the Navy will not come before Congress in time to give relief.

I sincerely hope that the Senate will refuse to concur in this conference report, and will send the bill back to conference, with instructions that its conferees insist on the amendment that has been adopted by the Senate. It is of great importance, and I feel that the Senate conferees should not yield. Overhaul our ships instead of letting them go to the scrap heap. This is real economy.

Undue postponement of work under peace conditions will throw thousands of workmen out of employment and may add to the discontent which can be seen in so many parts of this country.

The failure to keep our Navy up to the great standard it has attained will mean greater expense in the future and much larger appropriations. The expenditure of the amount now required will be a stitch in time. Let us keep our Navy fit.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no doubt this report will be adopted. Such has been the almost uniform course of procedure on reports from committees of conference since my identification with the Senate. I realize that the Senate members of this conference committee have exerted themselves to the full in the effort to save the Senate amendments to the bill, and that they have yielded because of the impossibility otherwise of coming to an agreement. We must make allowance for these conditions, first, because all conference committees necessarily arrive at compromises, and also because some items of this bill are of great emergent importance, so that my purpose is not to oppose the adoption of the report—although I shall vote against it if a vote is taken—but to emphasize what has been said as to the importance of the item regarding ships and also to express my hearty concurrence in the attitude taken by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] with regard to this hospital.

Ever since the bill was enacted into law making an appropriation of $8,000,000—that being the sum, according to my recollection—for the acquisition and completion of additional hospitals for the Public Health Service, the subject has been one of controversy, largely the outgrowth of the competition of the different States of the Union for the expenditure of this $8,000,000, my own State being quite as active in insisting upon its recognition as any of the others. The purpose of the law was obvious, and the method of its administration should have been businesslike and as a matter of course, but it has been interfered with from its inception by rival claimants for recognition in the establishment or purchase of hospitals and hospital sites. I have had a good deal of sympathy with the Surgeon General and his various boards in their earnest efforts to reconcile what can not be adjusted. The demands of Colorado, North Carolina, Texas, Illinois, and other States for the distribution of $8,000,000 have completely upset the orderly course of procedure by the authorities having the execution of this law, and I have but little doubt that nothing has been accomplished, although the bill became a law early in the year 1919.

I know but little about the facts connected with the Speedway Hospital controversy. I do know that it has been active ever since the enactment of the law and has produced a good deal of friction between those owning and desiring to dispose of it to the Government and those having the administration of the act. Some features of this controversy were outlined yesterday by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the former Secretary of the Treasury. The disposition made of it by the conference committee, and which we are now considering, is in all probability the best that the circumstances permit; but I have not a particle of doubt that before a year passes efforts will be made to secure additional appropriations for the completion or extension or compensation to the owners of this enterprise, because that is what it seems to be.

Of course, the action of one Congress can not bind its successors, and I greatly fear that once we are committed to the purchase of the Speedway Hospital we will have embarked upon a career of additional expenditure for the purpose of making it habitable for invalids in charge of and under the jurisdiction of the Public Health Service. I shall not, for that reason, attempt in any manner to prevent the early consideration and disposition of the conference report. I merely want to go on record as expressing the conviction that the end is not yet, and that hundreds of thousands of dollars will hereafter be demanded and in all probability given for the completion and consummation of this enterprise, which in my judgment the Government never should have considered at all.

DEVELOPMENT OF AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES.

Mr. PHELAN obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me to make a motion?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Out of order I desire to move that the Committee on Banking and Currency be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 3942, to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the United States through Federal and State cooperation, giving preference in the matter of employment and the establishment of rural homes to those who have served with the military and naval forces, and that it be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, as I understand, in the House that bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. In the Senate it was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. It would seem to me that it should properly go to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands at some time in its career, although it involves a very important bonding proposition. I shall not oppose the motion of the Senator from Florida, who is the author of the bill and who introduced it, if he desires to have it go to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

Mr. FLETCHER. I make the motion after conference with the chairman of the committee and after a hearing this morning on the bill, at which sentiment seemed to be that it ought to go to that committee. Therefore I am making the motion in order to save time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I remember, the bill was referred to the Ways and Means Committee of the House, which corresponds with the Finance Committee of the Senate. I have not read the bill, and therefore I can not say whether or not it ought to go to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, but if it involves the issuing of additional bonds by the Government and it is to be financed, does not the Senator think it ought to go either to the Committee on Banking and Currency or to the Finance Committee of the Senate?

Mr. FLETCHER. It involves that question, and for that reason I asked to have it referred originally to the Committee on Banking and Currency, but that committee this morning seemed to be under the impression that it involved these questions of reclamation, with which the other committee is thoroughly familiar, and the expression of the members of the committee was that the bill ought to go there—I think the chairman will agree with that—and also that that committee could have jurisdiction over the question of making the scheme practical through the issuance of bonds or in some other way that the committee might determine. The primary question, however, is reclamation. The bill involves public lands only to a limited extent, because there are not very many public lands now available for this kind of reclamation, but it is national in its scope. It covers the whole country. It is a scheme for reclamation by irrigation, by drainage, and by any other process, so as to make lands now worthless of value and put them into cultivation, incidentally giving the preference to the soldiers and sailors of the late war.

I am making the motion because I thought that was the sense of the committee, and I thought the chairman agreed with the proposition that it ought to go to this other committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Even if the object of the bill were what the Senator says it is, and it affects the public lands, it certainly ought to go to the Public Lands Committee. Other bills of the same character have always gone to that committee. While I am not at all anxious to take the work, I do believe that that is the proper committee to which the bill should be referred, if it is not to go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. FLETCHER. My understanding is that it will perhaps involve some public lands, but only a very small acreage of public lands is now available for this purpose; and as reclamation is the main feature of the bill, it was thought that the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands ought to have it.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if the bill refers simply to private lands, that is another question.

Mr. FLETCHER. It refers mainly to private lands.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says "mainly," but I understand that the bill refers not only to private lands, but also to public lands; and, if that is the case, it seems to me it ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think if the Senator will examine the bill he will be convinced that it ought to go to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, because irrigation is the fundamental primary thing involved. They are considering all such questions and I do not believe that——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there seems to be a very interesting conversation going on. I would like to know what is before the Senate and what we are doing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make a point of order?

Mr. WARREN. I do not wish to do so, but if the debate is to continue I shall be compelled to make it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion made by the Senator from Florida is not debatable.

Mr. SMOOT. In order that I may have time to examine it, I object at the present time, and I will take up the question with the Senator from Florida during the day.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn for the present.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12046) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I have no intention to obstruct nor to delay a vote upon the conference report. I learn from Senators on both sides of the Chamber that, in their opinion, it is futile to send it back to the House, because on a certain day before this discussion was had the House voted 2 to 1 in favor of the conference report. But the motion in the Appropriations Committee of the House to report ten millions favorably was lost by only 1 vote, and the House followed the committee.

The history of this item, however, will give the Senate a hope that in case it is resubmitted it will have a reasonable chance of being reconsidered by the House, for this reason: The department asked for an appropriation of $10,314,000 for repairs last September, and the House approved of it. In the debate in the House I find that strong arguments were made in favor of not only the necessity of creating a fund for repairs but the real economy involved in making the appropriation at that time.

The Appropriations Committee—

I read from the proceedings of the House—

who considered those arguments reported to the House in the first deficiency bill these very items last September, and the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, in an ardent address to the House, advocated their inclusion in the bill four months ago in the interest of economy. He stated at that time that he had consulted with Mr. BUTLER, of the Naval Affairs Committee, that he had consulted with Mr. PADGETT, of the Naval Affairs Committee, and other members of the Naval Affairs Committee, and that those members said it was a necessity, and that they were glad the Appropriations Committee had included them in their bill. This House passed these items four months ago, on the 18th of September, as necessary and urgent deficiency appropriations, and they were defeated in the Senate.

The House has already approved them at a time when they were not so insistent upon false economy and the Senate disapproved. Since then the Secretary of the Navy has made a very strong appeal and the Senate reduced the amount asked for by the Secretary to $3,000,000. Certainly if the House is at all consistent, it will accept the $3,000,000 rather than no appropriation at all, if, indeed, it believes in the true economy of making repairs at this time. Therefore, if the conference report is defeated for these reasons it is not unreasonable to expect that the House will reconsider its action, because it is committed to a greater appropriation for the same purpose.

On January 21 the Secretary of the Navy wrote this letter:

The serious situation with reference to the military efficiency of the Navy impels me to write earnestly inviting the attention of Congress to the necessity of the deficiency appropriation of $10,314,962.19, requested by me in my letter to you of the 18th day of December, 1919, and which passed the House last summer, but which failed of passage in the Senate. The conditions are much more serious now than they were when presented at that time and are set forth fully in the accompanying letters from the chiefs of the Bureaus of Operations, Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Yards and Docks.

In his report Admiral Coontz, Chief of Operations, makes a new point which was not brought out in the discussion. It is this:

The present unsettled conditions—throughout the world demand that the ships of the Navy be kept in efficient condition for action. The number of ships now capable of operating effectively in case of emergency is dangerously small. This condition is a direct result of a lack of funds with which to prosecute vigorously the required repair work on vessels whose material fitness has been lowered through the excessive and continuous demands of war service.

He writes—

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I may remark at this time, said that $700,000,000 had been appropriated for the Navy, and therefore there would be no trouble in finding in the $700,000,000 the funds necessary for the repair of ships. I read the other day that $75,000,000 was necessary to recondition the merchant passenger fleet. Suffice it to say that although the fund appears large for the maintenance of the Navy those funds are so appropriated that only so much is available for repairs, no matter how large the sum total appropriated is, and the chiefs of the department and the Secretary say that the repair fund is depleted and that they will have to stop work unless this appropriation is made. Admiral Coontz goes on to say:

Although every effort has been made to reduce maintenance charges by disposing as rapidly as practicable of the vast accumulation of shipping that it was imperative to incorporate into the Navy to meet the needs of a wholly unprecedented war, it has not been possible to adjust to the money available the work necessary on the remaining vessels required for service, as might have been done in a period of peace. The situation, therefore, which now confronts the Navy in case additional funds are not made available by February is a reduction of the number of ships which can be made promptly available for operation to a point which will seriously compromise our national security and also a marked reduction of the force of civilian employees now at work in our navy yards.

This is a new point which has just been brought to my attention—the reduction of employees. He says:

An estimate of the number of artisans, mechanics, and other yard employees involved in such a reduction has been made and amounts to 13,900 men.

This situation was clearly foreseen, as is indicated by the steps taken last August to secure an extension of the maintenance appropriations. It has now developed to the point where further delay in securing additional funds will affect disastrously both the material efficiency of the fighting forces of the Navy and also, in so doing, the valuable work organizations of thousands of skilled mechanics now employed in our navy yards.

I assume, on the face of these reports, that the work has to be done. If it is not done now, if the appropriation is denied, it means the disintegration of the organization of mechanics and workers. They will be scattered to the four winds. It will be difficult to regather them. At this time I think it would be unfortunate for the service and the country to permit 13,900 men to be turned out without employment when their work and service are necessary. If they are to be dismissed, let them be dismissed when their work is completed. We not only keep them in employment, we not only maintain the yard organization, but we repair the ships necessary, as the admiral says, for our national security.

Therefore I am of good hope if the report goes back to the House, they having approved it only four months ago in a larger measure, will meet our conferees on a proposition of this kind and permit the great ships of the Navy to be put in a fighting condition. Therefore I do not think it idle to send the report back, and I should like to ask when the question comes before the Senate that there may be a yea-and-nay vote upon it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not wish to enter into a lengthy discussion of this matter. The latest movement of the House of Representatives is the one we have to abide by instead of one in the past. The bill carried $69,500,000 to rehabilitate soldiers and to pay them their dues in the way of pensions, allowances, and so forth; to pay the families of those who have been killed, and to pay those who are disabled, and also to supply the vocational education fund. Out of the total of $89,000,000 there is $69,500,000 for the soldiers alone direct. There is also a provision for hospital use that is immediately needed. The owners of the Drexel Avenue Hospital, with 500 beds, will not renew their lease which expires in September, and we should move at once in hospital matters to provide for these and for others.

This is an urgent deficiency bill. It is not a regular annual appropriation bill for the coming fiscal year, which can as well wait. There is money due that ought to have been paid day before yesterday and since to employees of the Government. The conferees did all they could in the matter, and I consider it perfectly useless to send back the report. If the Senate sees fit to send it back that is the Senate's prerogative. As to the amount of money, it is undisputed that there is money enough for all these Navy purposes, and if it requires a transfer from one to another fund, the war laws now in effect, the authority that we have given the President to remove a man from one place to another and the fund from one fund to another would leave it simply a matter for the Secretary of the Navy and the President to adjust.

So I ask that the report may be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. PHELAN. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS's name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on official business. He has a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], which I transfer to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (after having voted in the negative). I voted not knowing that my pair, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] is absent. I therefore withdraw my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea." This transfer will stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "nay."

Mr. BECKHAM. Has the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I agreed to pair with him during his absence, and therefore I must withhold my vote.

Mr. EDGE. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] and vote "yea."

Mr. HENDERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], but I understand that if present he would vote "yea." I will therefore allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] in attendance at the funeral of the late Senator BANKHEAD.

STATES OF ARMENIA AND ANATOLIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany in open executive session.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator withhold that motion while I offer a resolution and have it read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator very much. I submit the resolution, which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 320) was read, as follows:

Whereas the presence of the Government of the Ottoman Turks at Constantinople has for many centuries been a constant cause of disorders, massacres, oppression, poverty, and pestilence among the Christian peoples of both eastern Europe and Asia Minor; and

Whereas the Turks, in league with the Germans, cruelly massacred nearly 1,000,000 noncombatant Armenian and more than 200,000 Greek Christians in Asia Minor during the late war; and

Whereas the Ottoman Turks are wholly disqualified to exercise political authority over Christian peoples and ought not to be permitted to extend their territorial domains by the massacre of the Christian native inhabitants; and

Whereas there can be no peace in eastern Europe and Asia Minor until the political authority of the Turks is eliminated from Europe and also from the ancient and proper territory of Armenia, comprising the six valleyets designated in the armistice with the Turks; and

Whereas the policy of the enlightened Christian powers has for years been directed to the liberation of Constantinople and Armenia from the despotism of the Ottoman Turks and the establishment of a just and stable Government for the Turkish population concentrated in Anatolia, as affording the only permanent basis for justice, liberty, peace, and progress in the Near East; and

Whereas Constantinople is an ancient European Christian metropolis having proper commercial, geographical, and political connections with Europe rather than with Asia; and

Whereas it is necessary for the accomplishment of these objects that all political relations between Constantinople and Asia be terminated and that no political authority in Anatolia or in Armenia be hereafter exercised from Constantinople: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the ancient and proper territory of Armenia, comprising the six valleyets designated in the armistice with the Turks, be erected into an independent national State, from which the political authority of the Ottoman Turks shall be excluded; and be it further

Resolved, That Constantinople be separated from all political connections with Asia Minor and be constituted an independent State under the temporary protection and police of the allied powers or the League of Nations, and that hereafter no political authority over Anatolia or any other country of Asia Minor be exercised from Constantinople; and be it further

Resolved, That Anatolia, excluding the six valleyets of Armenia, be recognized as the independent national State of the Ottoman Turks, under the temporary protection and police of the allied powers or of the League of Nations, for the prevention of massacres and disorders, for the administration of justice, and the preservation of peace.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has just submitted a resolution and asked its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The resolution has to do with the political and other conditions in Asia Minor. I think it well that I call the attention of the Senator from Utah and of the Senate to the fact that on November 18 last the Senate passed a resolution in this language:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to send to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of the report on near eastern conditions, made by the mission headed by Maj. Gen. James G. Harbord, and known as the "Harbord mission."

Mr. President, I understand from the office of the Secretary of the Senate that not only has the report referred to in the resolution failed to reach the Senate but that there has been no acknowledgment of the resolution itself. I may say, in passing, that the "Harbord mission" mentioned in this resolution traveled all through Asia Minor and spent many weeks in a very exhaustive investigation of the political, military, economic, and religious conditions there. Not only did it travel through Asia Minor and cover the villayets mentioned in the resolution of the Senator from Utah, but it also traveled through the Caucasus, into Georgia, if I recollect correctly, and a portion of northern Persia, and examined and made a most careful investigation of the whole situation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from New York if the report to which he refers contained any information as to the number of men that would be required to take over the mandate of Armenia or of Turkey and the expenditures that would be involved thereby?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the report has not been made public. I happen to know, however, that the report does discuss that matter, as it was fully expected to do.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me to have the German peace treaty taken up, the subject he is discussing is, I think, entirely relevant to the treaty.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had no intention of entering into any extended discussion of this matter, and I shall yield the floor in just a moment.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I did not mean to interfere with the Senator at all, for I think his subject is quite as live a one as is the treaty.

Mr. KING. It could be discussed under the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. It could be discussed under the treaty.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for the purpose of allowing the treaty to be taken up on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is that in open executive session the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty with Germany.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have the floor, Mr. President, but I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to have order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has the floor and he has yielded to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, what I was asking for was that the conversation all around be a little subdued, because I regard the question which the Senator from New York is discussing of the utmost importance. If the Senator will allow me just a word——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems that in November the Senator from New York offered a resolution of inquiry, which was adopted by the Senate, calling for a report to the Senate and to the public of the result of the Harbord mission, which was undertaken at the expense of and for the purpose of securing information for the people of the United States. That information, Mr. President, bears directly upon one of the obligations which it is proposed that the United States shall assume under the direction and government of the League of Nations, if it is adopted.

Here we are just about to vote on the covenant of the League of Nations and are voting upon reservations that are proposed to it involving the obligations that the United States is to assume. One of the obligations proposed was that we should take over the mandate of Turkey. Here is a report that the Senator from New York says contains information as to the size of the army that would be required to be raised in the United States and transported to Turkey for that purpose and as to the amount of money that would be required to be levied upon the people in the way of taxes, all of which is pertinent to be considered in determining whether or not we shall have any League of Nations and whether or not the United States shall assume the burdens and obligations that will rest upon it under the League of Nations; but it seems that information is denied. If the Senator from New York has the information, I should like very much to have him tell us the views of the State Department upon the report of the Harbord mission.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not, of course, authorized to express the official views of the State Department. My interest in this matter has been very intense, and has extended over a considerable period of time, as may be observed by the date borne upon the face of the resolution.

The State Department did me the courtesy of allowing me to examine the report, with some suggestions that here and there a sentence occurred that might well be eliminated before publication was made, in which suggestions, generally speaking, I thought the State Department was correct. With such eliminations, which could be very easily made and which I took it upon myself to say I would defend upon the floor of the Senate if the report was sent here in that shape, the State Department was in favor of making the report public by transmission to the Senate, and informed me so on two or three occasions, not only through a subordinate official but through the Secretary of State himself. Apparently, however, the State Department has been powerless to see that this report be sent to the Senate for its information. The permission of the President has never been obtained. To my mind, this is another indication of the studied indifference of the President to courteous and reasonable requests by the Senate of the United States for information having to do with matters of tremendous importance pending before the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Sentor from Utah?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I do not think that the President is at all at fault in respect to this matter; it is quite likely that the changes in the State Department have had something to do with the delay. I want to assure the Senator that if he will introduce another resolution calling for a response to his former one, I shall be glad to join with him in securing its passage.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I can not, of course, place my finger exactly where the blame lies. I merely know that the State Department more than seven weeks ago, upon my third visit to the department with respect to this matter, assured me that they thought the publication of the report and its transmission to the Senate was an entirely proper thing. At that time the report was in the White House, and it has been there ever since.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New York that this is habitual. Never before, I believe, in the history of our Government have acknowledgments of Senate resolutions been refused. Sometimes we have been told that it would take time to make the reply; very rarely it has been said that it was incompatible with the public interest; but never until the present time have inquiries been passed over—not one inquiry, but literally hundreds in the Mexican case—without even acknowledging the receipt of the resolutions.

Mr. President, the sixth reservation is now before the Senate, and I move to modify it by striking out the words "between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to reservation No. 6, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes to modify or amend reservation No. 6, as reported, by striking out the words "between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan," so that, if amended, it will read:

6. The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles.

Mr. LODGE. The only purpose of this reservation, which was suggested by Senators on the other side, is to avoid naming the two countries specifically, and to leave it simply "any controversy which may arise under said articles." It does not change the purpose of the reservation at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to reservation No. 6.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there must be some reason, of course, for the failure of the President to respond to the resolution of inquiry of the Senate, and one's mind naturally undertakes to fathom the purpose and reason of the executive branch of the Government in withholding this information.

I am informed—whether accurately or not I do not know; it is mere rumor so far as I am concerned—that the Harbord mission made a recommendation in regard to the proposed mandate of Turkey. If the information which I have is correct, this recommendation would be contained in the report which the Senate called for; and my information is that that report was adverse to the assumption by the United States of responsibility for the Government of Turkey, drawing its conclusions from a mass of information which the mission obtained and which it had collated and presented in its report.

It is further said—and whether or not the saying is true is what we want to find out by having this report submitted—that Gen. Harbord, who was appointed at the head of this mission very largely because of his military knowledge, because it was a report which was to determine the military action of the United States in this matter, has reported that it would require a large army to perform the task which would devolve upon the United States if this covenant of the League of Nations is adopted.

I have heard it suggested that a minimum number of 250,000 men would be required to be raised in the United States, and transported halfway around the world, to carry out, under the direction of a foreign power or combination of powers, sitting as the council or the assembly of the League of Nations, the duties that would devolve upon us as a mandatory—that is, as an agent—to act under the League of Nations, to police Turkey, to protect the Armenians, and to set up an orderly government in Constantinople.

Also, it is said—and, not having the report, we have to rely upon what is said, on dit—that the lowest amount of money that would enable the United States to carry out this expedition would be a billion dollars. We have already obligated ourselves to the extent of $30,000,000,000, including what we have loaned to the Allies, in the German war. We have probably lost the Monroe doctrine, whether we act upon the League of Nations or not, because I notice in the morning papers that numerous South American countries have joined the League of Nations—this League of Nations which has gotten away from us, but which we started, for which the President is chiefly responsible, and which puts the conduct of American affairs, which under the Monroe doctrine was vested in the American Republics, in a combination of Asiatic and European powers. I assume that those Republics to the south will be members of the League of Nations—this Frankenstein monster among the Governments of the world which we have set up in our studio, and which has slipped out of the door which was left unlocked—whether the Senate adopts these reservations to the League of Nations, or ratifies the treaty with or without reservations, or not, or whether the President approves of these reservations or not.

Of course, it is to be remembered that these reservations, if they are approved by the Senate, or if the treaty is ratified by the Senate with the reservations attached to it, must also be approved by the President. It requires the advice and consent of the President, as well as of the Senate, in order to make the treaty. We call this a treaty. It really is a constitution for a government of the world; and if the Senate ratifies the treaty, which I do not think it will do, it will not go into effect, because the President is not going to ratify it or consent to it or negotiate it or proclaim it, as he must do before it has the effect of law, if the reservations which the Senate is going to attach to it are attached to it. So I say that we have probably lost not only the vast sum of money which we have spent, and which we have loaned, and on which interest is remitted—by the way, without any authority of law for its remission—but we have probably lost the Monroe doctrine by this adventure into world politics, without consultation with his constitutional advisers, by the head of the executive branch of the Government, because the League of Nations goes into effect, and the South American Republics join it, and the United States will be estopped from objecting to the assumption of jurisdiction by European and Asiatic powers over international disputes involving the South American Republics, from which heretofore they have been barred by the wise policy of Mr. Monroe and his successors in the Government of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I noticed in the press yesterday, or possibly the day before, the reported reply from the President to interrogations submitted by the minister from San Salvador with respect to the interpretation placed by the administration upon the Monroe doctrine. As I recall that brief reference to the reply of the President, I think I can assure the Senator that the Monroe doctrine is not lost, and that the President of the United States and the present administration will be just as vigorous in asserting the Monroe doctrine as any President or any administration from the time of the promulgation of the doctrine to the present time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is quite encouraging, and at the same time it would be quite amusing to suppose that the President of the United States, after having conferred jurisdiction in American affairs upon the League of Nations so far as he was able to confer it, and the republics of the American hemisphere having accepted the opportunity which was given them to join the League of Nations, should now become the champion of the Monroe doctrine again. The trouble about that is that it would be too late. The Senator from Utah knows what the provisions of the League of Nations covenant are with regard to the settlement of disputes between nations, and he knows the authority that is conferred upon the assembly and upon the council of the league to determine these disputes.

But, Mr. President, I only rose to say that one might draw the conclusion that the reason for withholding this report, if it contains any such matter as that to which I have referred, is in order that the recommendation and report as to the expense and as to the size of the Army to be imposed upon the United States as an obligation under this treaty may not have the effect of preventing the ratification of the treaty. It seems to me that is the only purpose of which we can conceive for ignoring the request of the Senate. Whether or not that is a worthy motive, whether that is a proper and frank and sincere way to deal with it and to deal with the American people in a matter which involves their international relations for the future, will have to be determined by the people themselves.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can not definitely reply to the suggestions made by the able Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] as to the reasons why the resolution of inquiry which he introduced has not been responded to. I do, however, want to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that, so far as my recollection serves me, every resolution which called for information from the President of the United States has been promptly responded to during the time that I have been in this body. The President has been expeditious, prompt, and courteous in transmitting to the Senate information to which it was entitled and which it requested him to submit.

For the past few months, as the Senator knows, the President, by reason of his illness, has not given attention to some of the details of the various executive departments; but he has, notwithstanding his indisposition, carried heavy executive burdens and disposed of a multitude of matters of the highest importance. The gravest international questions have received his attention, and his decisions upon them, as well as upon important domestic problems, have challenged the admiration of his supporters as well as his political opponents.

It would seem from the Senator's statement that the resolution should have been responded to, or at least there should have been an acknowledgment of its receipt and a statement concerning the time of the reply thereto. But I feel sanguine that any delay in supplying the information desired can not be attributed to the President of the United States, and if there is any delinquency it will be found to be with some other branch of the Government.

The Senate will also bear in mind the fact that changes have occurred in the State Department, and that both former Secretary Lansing and Mr. Polk were in Europe for months. Their presence at the peace conference was required as well as that of other officials of the State Department. It is easy to see how a resolution even from the Senate might be overlooked for a time in view of the vast amount of work which the State Department has been compelled to perform during the past 18 months. I feel sure that the resolution will receive attention at an early date; if it does not, I shall be glad to support the Senator in a request for the passage of another resolution which will specifically require that the desired information be furnished to the Senate. I agree with what has been said by the Senator, that we are entitled to that information. It would enable us to act more intelligently upon questions dealing with European matters, and particularly questions which relate to the Balkans and Asia Minor, if we had the information contained in the Harbord report.

The resolution which I just offered calls for an expression by the Senate upon a matter of transcendent importance to the peace of Europe and to the welfare and freedom of millions of people.

Mr. President, a word or two concerning the resolution which I have just offered with respect to Turkey and Armenia. I shall not trespass upon the time of the Senate to discuss this resolution while the treaty is before us. At an early date, however, I hope to have an opportunity to submit some observations concerning this resolution and matters directly related thereto. I feel constrained, however, to express my profound regret at the attitude recently taken by the Government of Great Britain as announced by Premier Lloyd-George in an address delivered by him in the House of Commons. He stated in substance that the plan determined upon was to allow the Government of the Ottoman Turks to remain in Constantinople; and his attitude indicated a perfunctory regret because of the atrocities now being committed by the Turkish troops and the Turkish people upon the Christian peoples in Armenia and within the territorial limits of the Turkish Empire, rather than a determination to prevent their continuance. Even while he was speaking news came to Europe and the United States that more than 16,000 helpless Armenians had been butchered by the Turks within a few days prior to the arrival of the information. The universal sentiment of the Christian peoples of the world calls for the destruction of all Turkish power in Europe and the establishment and protection of the Armenian nation.

The Christian nations everywhere believed that one of the fruits of the Great War would be the overthrow of the Turkish Government and the extermination of its political and governmental power in Europe and the emancipation of Armenia from the tyranny and cruel oppressions of the Turkish Empire. No one doubted but what Greece was to receive Thrace and such other territory as ethnologically and culturally belonged to the Greek nation, and that the Turkish domination and authority and power in Europe would be forever destroyed. The peoples residing in the allied and associated Governments entertained no doubt but what the Armenians would be restored to their ancient possessions and territory and be permitted to establish a Government of their own choice, absolutely free from the control of the Turkish nation.

It would seem that those views were mere dreams and will not be realized. Unfortunately this Nation is not in a position to speak with authority in this important matter or to bring compelling influence to the proper solution of this vital matter. We declined to declare war against Bulgaria and Turkey, though each of these nations was associated with Germany and Austria in the world contest and were making war, indirectly if not directly, upon this Republic. We did not recognize a state of war and refused, as I have said, to declare war against either of these nations. In writing the terms of the peace with Turkey our Nation will have no right technically to have any voice. Our allies who sit at the peace table will prescribe the terms to which the defeated Turkish nation must subscribe.

Our allies are determined, it would seem, that the Ottoman Turk is to be kept in Europe, that the Turkish Government is still to hold sway at Constantinople and exercise power and authority over a vast territory and millions of people, many of whom are not of the Turkish blood.

Armenia seems to have been abandoned and left to the cruel and merciless policy which Turkey in the past has followed, and which her present course indicates she will continue to follow. More than a million Armenians were ruthlessly murdered by the Turks during the recent war. Hundreds of thousands of Greeks residing within the limits of the Turkish Empire were brutally murdered. Senators will remember that a number of years ago the Turkish Government began a policy looking to the extermination of the Armenian people. The atrocities committed by the Turks were so awful as to arouse the indignation of the civilized world, and not until hundreds of thousands of these poor, defenseless people had been butchered was sufficient pressure brought to bear upon the Ottoman Government to restrain its wicked purpose to absolutely destroy the Armenians and rob them of their lands and possessions. The plan they then conceived, it is clear, will be executed if the allied and associated powers do not stretch forth their hands to prevent it.

Mr. President, there are more Christians in Constantinople than there are Turks. No part of Europe should longer remain under the flag of Turkey or the authority of the Turkish Government. Of course the Turks residing in Europe should not be despoiled of home or property. In peace they should be permitted to remain subject to law and amenable to the government which shall be established.

Within the limits of Anatolia the Turks greatly preponderate. There they should be permitted to establish a Government, but under such restrictions as will protect the hundreds of thousands of Greeks, Armenians, and other Christians who have homes and lands therein.

In the armistice which was declared between the Allies and Turkey it was clearly indicated that Armenia should obtain the six villayets named therein, and that they should have a free and independent Government. I can only repeat there will be profound regret throughout the civilized world if the allied nations perpetuate Turkish rule in any part of Europe and take no steps to protect the Armenians from the cruel oppressors who have for centuries sought their destruction.

Many will regret the situation which seems to silence our Government in dealing in this great crisis with the problems arising in the Balkans and in Asia Minor. There are many who sincerely believe that the voice of this Government should be raised in behalf of the Armenians and for their protection and in their behalf, and that this Nation should exercise a powerful influence in aiding the Armenians to establish a stable and independent government, and to defend their lives and government against the aggressions of the cruel and unspeakable Turk. The peace of Europe is involved in the proper solution of the Balkan, Constantinople, and Armenian problems, and it can not be said that the peace of this Nation and the peace of the world are not related to the peace of Europe.

This is no time for temporizing with the Turkish problem. The day of opportunism is past, and a definite and final settlement of the Turkish question now should be made. This settlement, I repeat, should call for the expulsion of Turkish political power from Europe and the establishment of an independent State at Constantinople under the League of Nations or under the supervision of one or more of the allied powers who would be amenable and subject to the jurisdiction and control of the League of Nations. It should also provide for an independent Armenia, and for a Turkish Government in that part of Asia Minor known as Anatolia, where admittedly the Turks are numerically stronger than all other nationalities combined. I realize that upon this question there will be divergent views, but I submit that the demands of justice and the future peace and welfare of Europe and Asia Minor, if not of the world, call for the protection of Armenia, the restriction of the authority of the Ottoman-Turkish Government, and its loss of political authority and control in any part of Europe.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I fail to see why anybody is mystified or even surprised that we are unable to get the information sought by the resolution offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. It is a part and parcel of the policy that this administration has maintained since 1913 to keep from the Senate of the United States information bearing upon our international relations, which it is not only our right but our duty to have, to read, to digest, to understand, and to apply.

The files of the Committee on Foreign Relations to-day are naked, so far as information bearing upon our international affairs is concerned. We ought not to be driven to the expedient of passing resolutions requesting information. The practice of our Government, from its foundation down to 1913, has been that when great matters affecting the interests of the United States and its relations to foreign Governments have arisen information has been volunteered, not only that the Senate through its Committee on Foreign Relations might be advised but that they might be put in position where they could study and consider what advice they might possibly be called upon to give in respect to such matters.

What is there in the files of the Committee on Foreign Relations that bears upon the negotiation of this peace treaty? Practically nothing. We never got the treaty itself until the enterprise of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] dragged it out of a newspaper office and it was put upon the records of the Senate against the protest of the administration.

Mr. President, I was told within the last week by one of the most responsible gentlemen whom I know that he had had occasion to visit a law office in the city of New York upon some professional business, and not being able at once to see the gentleman upon whom he called, he busied himself looking about the office. He saw 10 volumes as large as the bound volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which were each label "Treaty of Peace with Germany." He had time enough to take them down. He found propositions, counter propositions, protocols, original drafts, modifications of drafts—apparently every detail connected with the treaty with Germany; and alongside of them he said there were at least six other volumes, equally specific in detail, relating to the treaty with Austria. There is not one-tenth of one volume of such information upon the files of the Senate, either in the Committee on Foreign Relations or elsewhere.

So I say, Mr. President, there is no occasion for Senators to express surprise that the information contained in the report which the Senator from New York has asked has not been given, but it would have been rather a matter of surprise if it had been forthcoming.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I wish to say a word regarding the present reservation, which is the one by which we would refuse our assent to the provisions in the peace treaty conceding Germany's interest in Shantung to Japan.

The amendment that is pending merely strikes out the words "between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan," the amendment having been suggested by Senators across the aisle in the bipartisan peace conference.

Mr. President there is nothing I can say that would affect the vote of any Senator upon this proposition. It has been debated at great length. But I do wish to quote the statement of one whose opinion should have great weight upon the other side of the aisle as bearing directly upon this question. I quote:

> But if substantial agreement on what is just and reasonable is not to determine international issues; if the country possessing the most endurance in pressing its demands rather than the country armed with a just cause is to gain the support of the powers; if forcible seizure of coveted areas is to be permitted and condoned and is to receive ultimate justification by creating a situation so difficult that decision favorable to the aggressor is deemed a practical necessity; if deliberately incited ambition is, under the name of national sentiment, to be rewarded at the expense of the small and the weak; if, in a word, the old order of things which brought so many evils on the world is still to prevail, then the time is not yet come when this Government can enter a concert of powers the very existence of which must depend upon a new spirit and a new order. The American people are willing to share in such high enterprise, but many among them are fearful lest they become entangled in international policies and committed to international obligations foreign alike to their ideals and their traditions.

The statement that I have quoted is from President Wilson's note of February 10 upon the Adriatic situation, every sentence of which condemns this provision in the treaty relating to Shantung. No one upon this floor or elsewhere, not even the President of the United States, has undertaken to defend this provision of the treaty except upon one ground, and that was that because there was a secret treaty between Japan, Great Britain, and France, whereby they agreed to do this thing, the United States was helpless and necessity compelled the President to accept and accede to this great wrong. In confirmation of that statement I desire to quote a paragraph from President Wilson's speech at Indianapolis made September 4 last. He said:

> When we came to the settlement of the Shantung matter with regard to China we found that Great Britain and France were under explicit treaty obligations to Japan that she should get exactly what she got in the treaty with Germany, and the most that the United States could do was to urge upon Japan the promise, which she gave, that she would not take advantage of those portions of the treaty but would return to the Republic of China, without qualification, the sovereignty which Germany had enjoyed in Shantung Province.

Then a little later on he said:

> My present point is that there stood at the very gate of that settlement a secret treaty between Japan and two of the great powers engaged in this war on our side. We could not ask them to disregard those promises.

That is the President's defense on Shantung. But let me now quote another sentence from the President's Adriatic note of February 10. He said:

> It—
> The United States—
> is unwilling to recognize either an unjust settlement based on a secret treaty the terms of which are inconsistent with the new world conditions, or an unjust settlement arrived at by employing that secret treaty as an instrument of coercion.

The President takes the position that when he deals with the Adriatic situation he is not bound to a settlement and will not recognize a settlement based upon a secret treaty. In fact, he goes so far as to say that if that be insisted upon he must seriously consider withdrawing the treaty from the Senate and withdrawing the United States from any intervention in European affairs. And yet his defense of this wrong to Shantung is based upon exactly the same kind of a secret treaty.

Mr. President, I had supposed that principles of right and justice did not depend upon geography for their application, but evidently President Wilson's position is that a course of conduct based upon a treaty is right in Asia, but exactly the same course of conduct based upon a treaty affecting European affairs is absolutely wrong.

Mr. McCORMICK. Surely the Senator does not assume that it is geography which guides the President in the abandonment of a principle in one instance and its assertion in another. "Enlightened expediency" was the phrase which he used when he presented the instrument to the Senate—"expediency."

Mr. LENROOT. If the President has the power, and he has it, to compel a settlement of the Adriatic situation under the threat of withdrawing the treaty from the Senate and withdrawing from European affairs, he had the same power at the time he agreed to the Shantung provision in the treaty. So, granting that what the Senator from Illinois says is true, it is not a matter of geography, but a matter of expediency.

Mr. McCORMICK. Enlightened expediency.

Mr. LENROOT. Of enlightened expediency; and we are still as much mystified as ever to understand why the President should assent to these provisions in the treaty regarding Shantung, which he and every Senator condemned, and justified only upon the ground that because of the existence of the secret treaty the United States was helpless and was compelled to assent to it.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say except to add this one word. Senators upon the other side of the aisle profess that they are anxious for a ratification of the treaty. They deny charges made upon this side of the aisle that they are not in good faith in saying that they desire to come to some compromise which would secure the ratification of the treaty. Not one of them will defend this Shantung provision. This amendment was suggested by them. They indicated their willingness to vote for the reservation if this amendment was accepted by us. We will shortly have an opportunity of learning the good faith of these Senators when the vote comes upon the final reservation. We will then have an opportunity of ascertaining how many Democrats there are upon the other side of the aisle who wish to ratify the treaty, because they know that the treaty never can be ratified unless this reservation, withholding our assent from the Shantung provision, is adopted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before I sit down I shall have something to say relative to the reservation which is now before the Senate, but I desire to go back and approach it through the discussion of some other matters of equal importance with the reservation.

The President in his Adriatic note used this language:

> If substantial agreement on what is just and reasonable is not to determine international issues * * * then the time is not yet come when this Government can enter a concert of powers the very existence of which must depend upon a new spirit and a new order.

I take this as a text to justify a review of some of the history of Europe since the signing of the armistice, in order that we may arrive at a conclusion as to whether there is a new Europe, as to whether a condition of affairs obtains there which it was believed prerequisite to the successful organization of a League of Nations.

The League of Nations was based upon the theory that after the war we were to experience a new conception of public affairs; that Europe in particular should have undergone such scourge and such punishment that she would awaken to a new life and accept the principles of a new political existence. The President says practically in so many words in his Adriatic note that it was upon this theory that the League of Nations was sought to be organized, and if, indeed, it should appear there is now no new Europe, that there is not a new condition of affairs throughout the world, if, indeed, it should appear that the war has not wrought a change in the public standards and public ideals of Europe, then it is essential that we no longer undertake to act with Europe under a League of Nations or an organization which might be called a concert of powers for the purpose of inaugurating a new political era.

There was upon every hand, long prior to the Adriatic affair, the most conclusive proof that that which was supposed would exist and which was prerequisite to the organization of the League of Nations does not exist. The Adriatic affair, as the President has said, is the final proof of the fact that Europe does not propose to abandon her old precedents, policies, and standards, and it is for this reason, in my judgment, that the President wisely makes it conclusive, so far as his action and judgment are concerned.

It has been said here in debate that it is most extraordinary that the President would wreck the machinery which he sought to establish for the preservation of world peace on account of a few people inhabiting one or the other portions of territory along the Adriatic Sea. I do not view the President's action in that light. I think he must be conscious of the fact, as we are all conscious of the fact, that this is only one of many of the incidents which prove beyond controversy that Europe does not propose to accept the standards which it was believed it was necessary for her to accept in order to organize a League of Nations. Allow me to read that sentence again:

> But if substantial agreement on what is just and reasonable is not to determine international issues * * * then the time is not yet come when this Government can enter a concert of powers the very existence of which must depend upon a new spirit and a new order.

Have we, Mr. President, a "new spirit" and a "new order" in Europe, in Asia, or anywhere else in the Old World?

Mr. THOMAS. Or in this country?

Mr. BORAH. Or in this country, as the Senator from Colorado properly asks, which is declared to be prerequisite to the organization of this league?

I am going, Mr. President, to review some of the things which were promised, some of the things which have happened, and some of the incontrovertible facts of history since the days of the armistice to demonstrate that, according to the President's standard, it is not only wise and expedient that he should withdraw this treaty and the league but that it is supremely incumbent upon the Senate which has not yet committed itself that it take no step further toward entering into that concert of powers, which is the old concert of Europe with the United States added. Let the people of the United States and the people generally understand that, whatever we may have dreamed in the past and however much we may have hoped we were to enter a new world and a new condition of affairs, the facts are massed upon every hand, with history buttressing the contention, that that new condition of affairs does not exist, and, in addition, that Europe does not propose it shall exist. If it be conceded that a league with old Europe would be intolerable, in order to know our plain duty here, it is only necessary to address ourselves to the unmistakable facts, for it is old Europe with every prejudice, every custom, and every practice intact.

One of the prerequisites to a new era in the estimation of the President was the freedom of the seas. That was declared to be the sine qua non of a peaceful world; without it there could be no world peace and no successful League of Nations. I invite attention to the President's language delivered before Congress upon the 21st of January, 1917, in which he said:

> The freedom of the seas is the sine qua non of peace, equality, and cooperation. No doubt a somewhat radical reconsideration of many of the rules of international practice hitherto thought to be established may be necessary in order to make the seas indeed free and common in practically all circumstances for the use of mankind, but the motive for such changes is convincing and compelling. There can be no trust or intimacy between the peoples of the world without them. The free, constant, unthreatened intercourse of nations is an essential part of the process of peace and of development. It need not be difficult either to define or to secure the freedom of the seas.
> Difficult and delicate as these questions are, they must be faced with the utmost candor and decided in a spirit of real accommodation if peace is to come with healing in its wings, and come to stay. Peace can not be had without concession and sacrifice. There can be no sense of safety and equality among the nations if great preponderating armaments are henceforth to continue here and there to be built up and maintained.

I do not read this, Mr. President, for the purpose of implying any contradiction between past views and present ones on the part of the President, but for the purpose of invoking your attention to the fact that while the President states that the freedom of the seas is prerequisite to peace and to world settlement, such prerequisite was promptly refused by those writing the covenant. It is utterly useless to talk of peace with any one or two nations armed for the complete dominancy of all the high seas. That which took place between Germany and England for years and which finally led, in my judgment, more than anything else, to the recent war is now being initiated between England and the United States—competition in the building of vast armaments to float upon the seas. And this must go on even with the league, because that is one matter which England would not submit to common action.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I know the Senator wants to discuss and will discuss this very important phase of the subject in the light of all the facts. I trust, therefore, he will pardon me for reminding him that in the note of November 5, which formed the basis of the armistice of that month, the President in his letter to the German Government called attention to the reservation on the subject of freedom of the seas from the agreement upon which the armistice was based, in these words:

> They must point out, however, that clause 2, relating to what is usually described as the freedom of the seas, is open to various interpretations, some of which they could not accept. They must, therefore, reserve to themselves complete freedom on this subject when they enter the peace conference.

My purpose in calling the attention of the Senator to that note is not in any way to impair or seek to impair the force of his argument, for I am in full accord with the proposition that until such a question shall be determined permanent peace is at least questionable; but I think that the consideration of the treaty which has been made should always contemplate the fact that this was one of the subjects concerning which the Allies reserved to themselves complete freedom of action, and which was excepted by the German Government.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Colorado is entirely correct, and I should have, unless it slipped my mind, called attention to that, for the reason that that which the President declared to be a prerequisite for peace was arbitrarily and imperiously withdrawn from the consideration of the conference which was to initiate the world peace; in other words, what I am seeking to do, if the Senator from Colorado will follow me, is to show that there is no new Europe; that she relies upon the same principles and standards and policies upon which she relied prior to the war. The first act of Europe was to withdraw from the consideration of the peace conference that which the President believed, and which, in my judgment, the best-informed minds of the world believed, to be a prerequisite to peace. They were not even willing that it should be considered by the peace conference; they were not willing that counsel should be taken upon the matter; and, mind you, when Great Britain withdrew that prerequisite from the consideration of the peace conference every associate of ours in Europe stood beside Great Britain in her demand. In other words, it was a European demand that the first great factor of war, and in modern warfare the dominating power in war, should not be considered by the peace conference at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Idaho should also state that when Europe, through England, withdrew that element from consideration, the President acquiesced in it at once and made no objection whatever to its withdrawal.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that the President made no objection. I know he acquiesced in the withdrawal.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no record of any objection having been made, and we have the entire correspondence.

Mr. BORAH. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about that, I will say that the President acquiesced in all the demands which Europe made, as I shall disclose as I proceed. In my judgment it does not make any difference what idea the President carried with him to Versailles; when he reached Versailles he found that he could not move Europe from her determination to stand by the policies and the standards which she had always maintained. He had to accept European standards or take the Washington and come home, which, we are informed, he seriously contemplated doing. I am not here to fix personal blame; I am here to state results, and the result was that Europe, old Europe, prevailed in all matters.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. This particular thing, the freedom of the seas, that the President had officially said must be one of the things to be considered and settled at the peace table, he gave up before he went to Europe. He gave that up at the time he sent the official messages through Switzerland to Germany, so that it was given up before the armistice was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. I did not so understand. I know that the President recounted in his subsequent notes the demand of England that it should be left out; but my understanding was that the President never yielded upon the question of the freedom of the seas until after he reached Versailles. In conversation with Mr. Clemenceau, after the President reached Versailles, Clemenceau notified him that he would stand with Lloyd-George upon the question of the freedom of the seas, and the President acquiesced in it.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him further, I desire to say that the official correspondence, which was put into the RECORD by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and also by myself some time ago, by which the armistice was brought about, specifically removed from consideration the question of the freedom of the seas.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that Great Britain removed it.

Mr. NORRIS. It came about in this way: Germany communicated with the President in regard to an armistice. The two Governments operated through the ambassador of Switzerland here in Washington. The President communicated to the Allies, and Great Britain responded, making this reservation and one other. The President agreed to the reservation, and then submitted it, as the unanimous opinion of all of the Allies, to Germany through the ambassador of Switzerland.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the position just stated by the Senator from Idaho is the correct one, because the language of the note of November 5 concludes with the statement:

> They must, therefore, reserve to themselves complete freedom on this subject when they enter the peace conference.

Mr. BORAH. That is the inference I drew from the correspondence; but, Mr. President, I do not want to wander from my theme, because, whether or not the President objected so long as there was any opportunity to object, or whether he yielded readily, the thing which I desire to present to the Senate and particularly to the country—because, I presume, the opinion of the Senate is already made up—is the fact that every single standard which the United States set up as a prerequisite to a world peace and to a League of Nations was rejected by Europe; and while I stand here upon the floor of the Senate and state that, I ask any Senator to name a single instance in which that is not true?

Every single policy or principle that was announced as representing America's conception of peace was buried beneath the débris of the Versailles conference. Therefore, when the President, in his note on the Adriatic question says that, if it is apparent that a new condition of affairs does not exist, he will be under obligations to go no further in this concert of powers with Europe, every dominant historic fact from the time of the armistice until now proves beyond question that no new condition of affairs does exist. Whether he yielded at once or whether he yielded reluctantly and through force of circumstances, the fact remains that Europe had her way in regard to it, as she had her way in regard to everything else.

Having disposed of the control of the seas—I must be brief upon these questions—there was another prerequisite to world peace, which was stated not only by the President but was agreed to by Lloyd-George, by Gen. Smuts, and other distinguished advisers or members of the conference. They not only said that there must be disarmament on the seas, but that it must be made impossible to raise by conscript power vast armies; that the two things essential to world peace were, first, to disarm on the seas, and, secondly, to take away the power to call men into action by the power of conscription. Mr. George, in his campaign in 1918, made this declaration:

> On the eve of this important election, which means so much to the country, I wish to make it clear beyond all doubt that I stand for the abolition of conscript armies in all lands. Without that—

Observe the language—

> Without that the peace conference would be a failure and a sham. These great military machines are responsible for the agony the world has passed through, and it would be a poor ending to any peace conference that allowed them to continue.

That declaration was made while Mr. Lloyd-George was seeking authority from the electorate of England for the peace conference. It was made after the war had closed and when the dawn of a new day seemed to be breaking and when he was seeking a special authority from the people of his country for the purpose of inaugurating a new world condition of affairs. He made this statement and this pledge to the voters of England that he would see that this element of warfare was prohibited through the treaties of Paris in all lands and in all countries.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That statement of Mr. Lloyd-George was just a typical bit of British diplomacy and statesmanship. He did not say anything in his statement about reducing the sea power of Great Britain, and Great Britain has never maintained a large standing army. He was advocating the reduction of the military machines of other countries, while Great Britain maintained hers.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator calls it statesmanship. I will also call it that out of courtesy.

Gen. Smuts says:

> I would go so far as to say that while the great powers are allowed to raise conscript armies without hindrance or limit it would be vain to expect the lasting preservation of world peace. If the instrument is ready for use the occasion will arrive and the men will arise to use it. I look upon conscription as the taproot of militarism; unless that is cut, all our labors will eventually be in vain. * * * People simply will not stand it, and the menace of the great anti-State movement now finding expression in bolshevism will become as great a danger as war itself.
> In view of this double danger I would plead most earnestly for the abolition of conscription at the peace conference. Let the drunkard sign the pledge, even if we have to look round for some other less dangerous narcotic to soothe him in his troubles.

I might quote others, but I will not trespass upon the time of the Senate.

Mr. President, here are these statements concerning two elemental principles of world peace, made by men who were in a position to know, whose experience justified them in making them, and who were in a position to carry them out. They went so far as to declare that without their being incorporated in the treaty of peace or in the covenant of a new world all the work for peace would be in vain. Who shall deny their statements, who shall refute their conclusions? Yet the freedom of the seas remains precisely where it was before the war, and conscription is a thing not only unchallenged by the treaty, but made absolutely necessary if the league is sustained, for it is a league based upon the combined military force of four or five great powers. I invoke no other witnesses against this league and its utter futility for peace than the words of Mr. Wilson on the freedom of the seas, and Lloyd-George and Gen. Smuts on conscription. I sincerely hope the good people of this country will ponder for a time upon the promises as to what the league should be and what it is.

They disarmed Germany. They disarmed the enemy. They reduced them to absolute helplessness. They took away their navy. They reduced their army. They stood in a position, if they ever intended to initiate this movement, to initiate it at Versailles. I need not stop to remind the Senate that there is no intimation of any such program in the treaty or in the covenant of the League of Nations.

So much for the first test, which discloses early in the controversy that Europe does not propose to yield any of her policies or her principles. Indeed, Mr. President, let me be fair and say that I do not know that Europe can yield. I do not know that it is possible for her to yield. All I know is that if her standards are to be the standards of the past, if she is indeed in that condition where she can not change, let us not close our eyes to the fact that when we enter this League of Nations and this concert of powers we are entering upon conditions which have obtained in Europe for the last 300 years. Let us dispel once and for all the dream that we are entering a new world. If the people of the United States, looking over the history of Europe for the last 300 years, and recognizing the standards and policies and principles which have obtained on that Continent during that time, want nevertheless to risk this old Republic in that condition of affairs, with her one vote, that is the business of the people of the United States; but it is our business, as their representatives, to see that they do not go in blindfolded or with the facts denied them. Ah, more it is our business to see that we do not enter until the people have by their votes determined the question. Take the third test, Mr. President. During the war a great many secret treaties were made. I shall not stop to discuss their being necessary for the purpose of carrying on the war. I know that some of them were not; some of them may have been; but that is not the question to-day. These secret treaties were made and based upon the principle of the secret treaties which have tormented Europe for the last 300 years. The basis of the secret treaties was land grabbing—imperialism—the handing about of peoples without their consent, the trading them around as if they were chattels. Those were the principles upon which the secret treaties were made; and not only were the secret treaties made, but I want all to remember that Europe practiced her old system to the extent of refusing the United States an opportunity to know their contents. After we entered the war, under every principle of right and justice we were entitled to know the contents of those secret treaties. They should have been communicated to us through the proper official channels. They should have been called to the attention of the new associate. But, true to European traditions, according to the statement of the President, never until he sat down to the peace table at Versailles were these treaties opened before him.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did not the terms of some of these secret treaties go directly in the face of the 14 points, which they had accepted without saying that they had already made contracts which violated the 14 points?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; thereby adding duplicity to secrecy, in contravention of the things which were being announced as the principles upon which the war was being fought. But when the peace conference assembled, not only were the treaties for the first time placed before the conference, so far as the United States was concerned, but they were insisted upon to the letter; and the Adriatic trouble now is an attempt, by circuitous means, to carry out the secret treaty of London, which was made in 1915. The other secret treaties, to which I will refer incidentally as I go along, have been practically carried into fruition. There are two that I call to mind just now which perhaps are not yet fully executed. One is the treaty with reference to Adriatic affairs, and the other is the treaty with reference to Russia having control of Constantinople. But in so far as they have been dealt with, Mr. President, these secret treaties, which were based upon the old principles of European diplomacy and European policy, were made, secreted, and held until the time when they could be executed with proper effect. I venture to assert that the making of the secret treaties, the principles of selfishness and imperialism upon which they were based, the manner of their execution in disregard of the rights of subject peoples, will be found to differ in no respect from the practices, principles, and policies which have obtained in Europe during all these decades and which the President correctly declared were in eternal war with all schemes of justice and peace.

Has Europe yielded in any respect in regard to these things? On the other hand, has not the United States, in so far as she has gone, accepted the policy of Europe? Have we not accepted the policy of Europe with reference to freedom of the seas, with reference to conscription, with reference to secret treaties and their execution? Thus far we see, Mr. President, that Europe has had her way.

Now, we come to a third proposition, which to my mind is stupendous and overwhelming when considered in its moral aspect or the standpoint of national honor.

When Germany notified the United States that she was willing to enter upon the consideration of terms of peace, the President communicated to the Allies the terms upon which, in his judgment, peace could be had. The Allies accepted the terms of the President with two exceptions—one, the freedom of the seas, which they held for consideration at Versailles, and the other, a question of construction with reference to the matter of reparations.

Outside of those two propositions, the Allies accepted the proposition that peace should be made upon the terms announced by the President in his speech announcing the 14 points and the subsequent speeches delivered in reference to the question of peace. It is true, as has been said, that some of these speeches or messages perhaps are not concrete in their statement; but there is ample in these statements made by the President before the Congress, and the speeches which followed, to show that it was his contemplation and America's contemplation that peace should be formulated upon a new theory entirely. When the President communicated these statements to the Allies, and the Allies accepted them, it became a binding contract, certainly binding as a moral obligation.

The United States and the Allies, in other words, agreed among themselves and before the entire world as to the terms upon which peace should be executed, and the only terms, in the language of the President, upon which it could be executed if we were to have a permanent peace. What became of that contract when the Versailles conference was convened? Who will arise here and point out a single fundamental principle involved in it that was not disregarded, aye, discarded at Versailles?

I repeat, Europe perhaps was not able to accept them. The fact remains that she did not accept them, that the peace was made in contravention to them, and that the United States for the first time in its history was placed in the attitude before the world of going contrary to a solemn pledge which it had made to a fallen foe. If some one replies Germany was our enemy and we were at liberty to disregard the terms of the armistice, my answer is twofold. First, our honor and our agreements were involved, and we should have considered our duty from that viewpoint. Secondly, to disregard the terms of the armistice was to plant the seeds of war in the very soil of the new world which we were to build. If we owed nothing to Germany, which I deny, for having made the pledge it should have been kept, yet we owed everything to ourselves and the future peace of the world. In every instance in which these matters arose, in every instance in which these principles thus announced came in conflict with the secret treaties or came in conflict with the aspirations of particular powers in Europe, such as Shantung and other instances, the principles gave way to the secret treaties and to the imperialistic policies of Europe.

We are not underwriting therefore by this League of Nations the things which we went to Versailles to underwrite. We are not going behind the policies which we announced. Let the mothers and the fathers of this country whose boys are coming near to the time of service understand that we are underwriting no new Europe; we are underwriting an old Europe, according to all the old standards of Europe.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has made very definite assertions. Will he give some instances in proof of his assertions?

Mr. BORAH. I will give one that is before the Senate now, and that is Shantung; but I will give others in a few minutes.

The distinguishing feature of European diplomacy for the last 200 years has been its secrecy. Long before this war came upon us the liberal minds of Europe were denouncing secret diplomacy. It was, they asserted, more than any other one thing, the cause of suspicion and of jealousy, and finally of conflict, between the different powers of Europe. Secret diplomacy was denounced openly time and time again during the war, not only through the newspapers of the respective countries but certainly by our own President and also by leading men both of England and of France. It was claimed that the peace conference should sit in the open, that secret diplomacy for once and for all should depart. It was well said no treaty written in secrecy would have the respect or the moral support of the people of the world.

Who won in that contest? What nation gave way in that intellectual battle? Scarcely had they convened at Versailles until the doors were closed, and closed well against all the world. Not only, sir, were the doors closed, but there were guards, as it were, standing near for the purpose of preventing any news that might leak out going into the American press or into the European press. Not only was secrecy imposed upon the members while they were sitting, but every effort was made to keep the facts from the people. The discussions, the exchange of views, the proceedings, the reason for this or for that no one save the big four were or are now permited to know. How this principle of the armistice was argued away, how this principle of the President as announced was thrown into the discard, how Shantung was traded to Japan for the league, and how the whole scheme was consummated the world is not to know. Sitting behind closed doors they handed people about, divided nations, and remapped the world and then said, "Take or leave it."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator is now referring to the council between the nations as to the terms to be imposed upon Germany.

Mr. BORAH. I am referring to all the proceedings of the peace conference.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator does not call that a covenant, does he?

Mr. BORAH. The covenant is in the peace treaty, unfortunately.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a part of it, and that was made public before it was finally incorporated. The President brought it over to the United States, and it was published all over the world.

Mr. BORAH. It was made public after they had completed it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; the Senator is mistaken. It was made public before it was completed, because it was revised after the President's return to France.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; it was made public in that way. There was a revision that took place after he visited this country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In other words, after it had been subjected to the criticism of the world, it was again revised to meet that criticism as nearly as might be.

Mr. McCORMICK. Varnished, not revised.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is referring now to the council held by the Allies as to the terms that they were to impose upon Germany. That was not a covenant with Germany. That was a council as to the terms which were to be imposed by the victors upon Germany.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; and not in accordance with the terms of the armistice.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The League of Nations is the only other part of that treaty, and the League of Nations was published for weeks before it was finally framed. It was brought over to this country by the President, and it was discussed between him and the Committee on Foreign Relations and published in every newspaper of the land, and published all over the world, and then he took it back to France, and, accepting some of the criticisms that had been made, he secured changes in it to meet those criticisms. The Senator knows that.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I know it. But it was given complete examination and announced not only as complete but perfect.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, that is the covenant, is it not? That is the only covenant in the treaty.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator is through, I will continue.

Mr. President, taking the covenant alone, no man knows and no man can know what took place in the forming of that covenant. We know that a certain covenant, complete within itself, was first announced, because the President stated in his message to the gentlemen whom he invited to the dinner that every word had been considered and there was a reason for every word that was in the covenant.

Will the Senator tell me whether there is any information to be had anywhere as to the interchange of views or as to the reason why this particular portion of the covenant was put in or why it was not, or as to what particular drafts were before the council, or as to the views with reference to racial equality, or any of those things? Will the Senator tell us how the Monroe doctrine came to be written in the covenant as a regional understanding? It would be interesting to know. No, Mr. President, it was made in secret. After it was made in secret it was published to the world, and we were told that there were to be no changes in it whatever, that there was a reason for everything that was in it, and that before anybody thought about it, before you were permitted yourself to form an opinion about it, you must have instructions as to the reasons why this particular word was in it, the reasons for which arose and died in secret. This covenant was made just as every other alliance, concert of powers, or league has been made. They have all been published at some time—published and announced to be complete.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator wants to be fair. Can he instance a case in history in which a covenant, before it was finally adopted and signed, was ever published to the world?

Mr. BORAH. Suppose I can not; but we were told by the President that the instances of history were no longer to be precedents; that this was to be a new condition of affairs. But I can instance other cases. The Holy Alliance, the treaty of Westphalia, the treaty of Utrecht—all made in secret, just as this one was made, and in no different way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This covenant was not arrived at until it was officially signed and it was not officially signed until the President brought it to the United States, and when it was brought to the United States it was subjected to criticism, and then it was taken back to Paris and it was amended. I say that constitutes a covenant openly arrived at. [Laughter.] The hilarity of Senators presents no very serious answer to that proposition. Cite another case where a great covenant was framed by a large number of participants and then published to the world, subjected to the criticism of the world, and changed to meet that criticism.

Mr. BORAH. Dr. Dillon says in his book, and so have others, that the secrecy which surrounded this scheme for world peace was greater than the secrecy which surrounded the Vienna congress. He was there, and he is a great student of European history.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Dr. Dillon may say it, but the Senator is not able to point to another case in history where such an enormous stride was made in the direction of a covenant subjected to the criticism of the world before it was finally arrived at. It was not arrived at until the President had taken it back to Paris and it had been amended.

Mr. BORAH. I am deeply thankful it has not been arrived at yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know about that. We have heard from the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] to-day the declaration that it had been arrived at and that we are outside of it. I think as a matter of fact it has been arrived at. It has gone into effect, and it is just simply a question whether we shall be inside of it or outside of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let us go back over this matter a little and see whether or not this is open diplomacy, whether it is an open covenant openly arrived at. I will not stop to read at length Dr. Dillon, but I will call the Senator's attention to his book on the peace conference from page 99 on. I want to read just one paragraph:

> It was characteristic of the system that two American citizens were employed to read the cablegrams arriving from the United States to French newspapers. The object was the suppression of such messages as tended to throw doubt on the useful belief that the people of the great American Republic were solid behind their President, ready to approve his decisions and acts, and that his cherished covenant, sure of ratification, would serve as a safe guaranty to all the States which the application of his various principles might leave strategically exposed. * * * If the falsehoods circulated and the true facts suppressed were to be collected and published in a volume one would realize that depth to which the standard of intellectual and moral integrity was lowered—

At Versailles.

Dr. Dillon is a responsible man and he was there. He states clearly in his book that it was impossible to arrive at anything which transpired between the ten, or the four, after they were reduced to four, with reference to what took place in the forming of the covenant; and he further states that the secrecy which surrounded it and its publication was greater than that which took place about 100 years before when they formed the other Holy Alliance for the purpose of maintaining a world peace.

We have been striving here for the last several months to get the facts as they occurred in the peace conference with reference to the treaty and with reference to the league. Can anyone point to any thread of facts or testimony or any record of what transpired in the forming of this covenant? While they were considering it and making it and writing it and agreeing upon it the world never saw it until it was what they called completed, and the world has seen every completed document in Europe after those who wrought it thought it was safe to let them see it. That is precisely what happened at Versailles. So secretive were they that in many of their meetings no minutes of the meeting were kept.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska and will yield later to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has betrayed from time to time a great desire to get information about what occurred in Paris, and so have some of his colleagues, but there is not a Senator in the Chamber who has made any effort to secure such information for the purpose of throwing light on the subject. Every Senator who has sought such information was a Senator who had made up his mind in advance exactly how he was going to vote. He did not want any light on the subject for the purpose of enabling him to decide how he would vote, because he knew how he was going to vote. Every resolution of inquiry, every effort that has been made by Senators to secure such information has been made simply for the purpose of defeating the treaty and not for the purpose of enlightening him as to how he wanted to vote; in other words, it was not sought for a legitimate purpose.

Mr. BORAH. A legitimate purpose! Is disagreement with the President of the United States and a matter of honest conviction illegitimate? When did that happen?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is legitimate; but I say it was not for the purpose of seeking information. If a Senator seeks information in order to enable him to know how to vote, that is legitimate; but there has not been a Senator who sought any information for any such purpose, because every Senator who has made any effort to pry into the affairs of the President at Paris has done it simply for partisan purposes, for the purpose of defeating the treaty.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, that is the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska. I can put myself in the clear in a very few moments. I did not need facts which happened in that secret conclave to guide me. I knew the nature of the instrument as soon as I read it. It was, from my viewpoint, a betrayal of American independence and American sovereignty, and I did not need any other facts. But there is a vast number of people in the United States upon whom this burden will fall and who will have to bear its burdens—if there are burdens—who were entitled to the facts, and I was entitled to the facts in order to convey them to the people if I saw fit to do so. It matters very little so far as I am individually concerned, but it is a matter of infinite importance to the people of the country generally, and the people of the country generally are as ignorant of the facts as the Senator from Nebraska and myself. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Have not Senators who did not want any information on the thing made up their minds how they are going to vote?

In regard to the openness in which this covenant was openly arrived at, I wish to recall to the Senator's attention the fact that before the President brought it over here as a completed thing to submit to us and requested by a wireless message that we should not discuss it until he got here, the entire conference had accepted it in toto, and the committee which prepared it and had reported it to the conference had been discharged. The President stated to us when we suggested that it would have to be modified that it would be exceedingly difficult to procure any modifications at all because the committee that had reported it had been discharged, and if we asked any changes other nations would also ask changes; that he considered it a completed thing and disliked to make any suggestions. It was complete to that extent.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly it was complete, and if it had not been for some Members of the United States Senate, it would have been ratified and nothing else would ever have been done about it. The instrument as it came in the first instance from that Versailles conference would never have been contested by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is entirely correct, because I was willing to accept it; but the Senator from Idaho was not ready to accept it, and he, with others, suggested changes, and changes were made. So I say the whole world participated in the making of this covenant. It criticized it before it was arrived at, and it was not arrived at until it had been subjected to that world-wide criticism.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. LODGE. Simply to make the record correct, I will state that we did not, as I remember, propose any changes in the paper we signed. We simply said we would not vote for it, and that led to changes which made it worse than it was before.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was not referring to that; I was referring to constructive suggestions which were made by some of the public men of the United States, who were more interested in public affairs than they were in politics.

Mr. BORAH. Politics is getting to be rather a public affair in these days. It will be more so when this league gets out among the people. If you want any evidence of the fact that it is becoming a matter of public concern, watch the votes fall away over on the other side. If you want complete evidence of the fact that the people are taking hold of it and that they are getting on to the facts after 13 months of hard effort, and that the returns are coming in, look at the vote as it comes in from the Democratic side. Six months ago they stood a solid phalanx, and now falling away and deserting their former position, even leaving the President without a following; and I do not know, when the time comes, whether any of you will stand out against the proposition or not. That which you denounced six months ago as treason upon the part of some others you are now coming to indorse and accept, and, in my judgment, when the treaty is finally put up to you for ratification, after all the expressions which have been made, you will fall into line and ratify it as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has rewritten it. That is sufficient evidence, to my mind, that the people are getting hold of the facts. There will be another return on the ides of November, and there will be another readjustment of views on both sides of the Chamber after that return comes in.

Mr. President, let us take another one of the European policies; that is, imperialism. There has never been such land grabbing in the history of Europe as has taken place since the armistice was signed. There has never been such an exhibition of imperialism in the history of Europe as we now propose to underwrite by this treaty and this League of Nations. I call attention, first, to what Lloyd-George said during the days of the war. He said:

> As the Lord liveth, England does not want a yard of territory. We are in this war from motives of purest chivalry to defend the weak.

That is a quotation from Lloyd-George. Now, what did England get?

Leaving out Persia, England has received as a result of the war at least 1,607,053 square miles of territory and dominancy over 35,000,000 people. If you will take Washington, Oregon, California, Idaho, Nevada, Arizona, Utah, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas and add them together you will have within a few hundred square miles precisely what England has secured out of the war.

Mr. KNOX. Is that inconsistent with the statement of Lloyd-George? He said he did not want a yard. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. There never was such land-grabbing in the history of Europe as we are proposing to underwrite. It is larger than the original thirteen Colonies, larger than the Louisiana Purchase, larger than that vast territory which I have named lying west of the great Mississippi River.

Senators, when you have ratified the treaty and proceeded to your homes you will be called upon to explain to the people of the United States whether you are willing for your boys and their boys to underwrite this unconscionable and indefensible seizure of territory. You will be called upon to say to them, "We propose that you shall hold Egypt in subjection, that you shall hold Mesopotamia in subjection, that you shall hold Persia in subjection. Bear in mind to-day, my friends, that there is not a foot of this 1,607,000 square miles of territory but what is in open objection to the reign of the British Empire. Persia is objecting, Egypt is objecting, even old India is in insurrection, and from one end of this vast empire to the other this new territory is now in open protest against the land-grabbing which has been going on.

Take Persia, which has an area of 607,200 square miles. I did not include that in the other estimate. If you include Persia you have got something like 2,000,000 square miles of territory which you have turned over to the British Empire as a result of the peace conference at Versailles. Not strange that Lord Curzon should say:

> Great Britain has gained in this war all and indeed more than she set out to win. Our navy remains at the end of the war intact and unassailed. The principle of the freedom of the seas, which is the basis of our national existence, stands unimpaired and unimpugned. The British protectorate over Egypt is provided for in one of the clauses of the treaty, and our new possessions are made safe under our command.

Col. Hilder in the House of Commons said:

> The outstanding feature of the peace treaty is that it puts the British Empire at the highest point that it has ever reached in regard to territorial and world influence. Largely by force of circumstances and the leading part which our navy and army took in either the breaking down or destroying of the enemy we have been left with far greater territory and power than at any other period in the history of our race.

So far as I am individually concerned I do not care—except for the people who are held in subjection—anything about the possessions of the British Empire. I am not complaining if she can take these subject peoples and satisfy them and make them believe that they are better off under her rule and reign than they are without it; I do not care to what extent the British Empire legitimately spreads its influence over the world. I am not envious of her power nor jealous of her extended holdings. What I object to, my friends, is that we are becoming responsible for this condition of affairs; that we are proposing to underwrite and guarantee it; and we shall be under just the same obligation to see that Egypt remains a part of the British Empire as we shall be to see that Canada remains a part of the British Empire. When you say that Europe has changed, that there are different standards and different principles and different policies, consider the question of the freedom of the seas, of the conscription of armies, of secret diplomacy, of broken pledges, of land grabbing, and that is what we are asked to enter into and become a part of.

Now, let me read again what the President said the other day:

> But if substantial agreement on what is just and reasonable is not to determine international issues, * * * then the time is not yet come when this Government can enter a concert of powers the very existence of which must depend upon a new spirit and a new order of affairs.

But Great Britain is not the only nation which has been grabbing land and whose activities we propose to underwrite. France has taken possession of Syria in contravention of every principle upon which we went into the conference at Versailles, and in opposition to the wishes of the people and inhabitants of the territory. France is holding Syria to-day by force of arms. Blood is being shed there over the title which France claims, and it is one of the things which is stirring the very soul of the great Moslem peoples, the most deadly when aroused to war that have ever inhabited the face of the earth. Countless millions of Mussulmans from India and Egypt and China and all parts of the earth where they inhabit are now stirred to their depths by reason of the action of Great Britain in Egypt and in Persia and of France in Syria. It is this condition of affairs, this "new spirit" and "new order," into which we are asked to enter. Has Europe changed? Where is the "new spirit"? Where is the "new order"?

I read briefly a paragraph from Mr. Henesy W. Jessup, published in the Monitor, of Boston. It gives us an insight into the situation in Syria and to the question of the title which we are to underwrite:

> The French are engaged in a protectorate of an alien and hostile population. Naturally they are feeding out the offices to those whom they think they can trust and excluding from positions of trust and confidence any belonging to the elements or parties which voted for Great Britain or America. This policy can never unite the Syrians under their rule.
> Several conflicts have taken place between the natives and the French. The French sent a regiment and bombarded a part of Baalbek and they also had a clash with the Nasariyeh, northeast of Tripoli, at a place called Tel-Kalach. I am credibly informed that one of the American commissioners has a photograph of a French detachment with a machine gun holding back a deputation who were seeking to meet the American commissioner for the purpose of casting their vote against the French at Tripoli.
>
> Before the English evacuation Feisul and his army were subsidized by the English and paid in gold. Upon the evacuation England announced she could no longer continue this support, but it is believed it is being secretly done, because Feisul's army is still mobilized, and it is not known from whence he would derive revenue sufficient to keep it in commission unless he were being subsidized this way. Thus we have a condition in Syria where the principle of self-determination has been ignored, where the unanimous will of the people for a united Syria has been brushed aside, and where French, Arab, and English intrigue is keeping everything on the boil.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a minute. I want to finish the subject.

Now we come to another piece of land grabbing, that of Shantung, the matter which is covered by the reservation now before us. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] criticized rather severely the President for his "enlightened expediency" in giving way on the Shantung matter. I do not disagree with the Senator from Wisconsin at all upon that proposition. Everybody knows that Shantung is the price which we paid for the covenant of the league.

Amid what I conceive to be the great wrongs incorporated in this treaty, Shantung, of all, needs the least argument to prove it intolerable. Yet what legal or moral principle announced during the war as the basis for the maintenance of war and its sacrifices that is not violated by the Shantung settlement? It involves the betrayal of a friendly nation. It challenges our own national honor and at the bottom of it lies one of those great moral issues never settled until settled right. But I need not here go into details. If it were to be discussed, it would need to be discussed as a subject by itself. Everyone concedes that it enjoys a distinction in wrongdoing peculiarly its own. The only question seems to be how shall we successfully get by without actually righting the wrong?

Everyone understands, as I have said, that without Shantung having been transferred to Japan the League of Nations would have failed; and, if this covenant goes into existence, it is one of the things which will brand it for all time with dishonor. Here, however, is where I differ from my friend from Wisconsin, not in criticizing what the President did in giving way, but I differ from him when he thinks the Senate of the United States has fulfilled its complete duty when it merely expresses its disapproval of the transaction. We say by our reservation that the United States is free in the future to take what part she may in regard to this matter. So far, so good; but does it go far enough? Does it right the wrong? Does it stop the outrage?

What has been taking place in Shantung since we voted on the 19th of November? On the 19th of November we passed this reservation as it is now written and as it will again be passed. I want my friend from Wisconsin to review the record, if he has not already done so, to find out what has taken place since the 19th of November. The Japanese have been since the 19th of November dealing with Shantung as they have been dealing with the Koreans for the last 10 years. Every form of persecution and outrage by which to dislodge Chinese from their possessions and drive them from their homes, to degrade them with opium, to imbrute them, and to disorganize them has been going on since we disapproved of the disposition of Shantung upon the 19th of November.

When we pass the reservation again it will have no more effect upon the actual happenings in Shantung than if we had approved of its transfer to Japan.

There was only one remedy for this wrong; there was only one way to right this outrage. That was for the great Republic of the United States to say that she will never set her approval or her confirmation to a treaty thus impeached by the betrayal of a friendly nation. This treaty should have gone back to Versailles. What we, sitting here in the Senate to-day refuse to do to right this wrong our successors will not be able to do, because the wrong will have been consummated.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether his reasoning would not carry him to a point where we would refuse to have any friendly relations of any kind with any nation that participated in this outrage, and where would that lead us?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that that would occur; but we are now as a Nation about 150 years old; so far we have refused at any time in our history, from our first days on, ever to ratify a treaty which the world could point to as a betrayal upon the part of the United States of a solemn pledge which she had made to the world or to another people.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will yield, I desire to say that, of course, he understands that if this reservation is adopted we do not ratify that portion of the treaty with Germany?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, Mr. President, there is where the Senator and I differ. We simply say that the United States reserves the right to take what action she chooses in regard to it; but the wrong has the protection of a treaty which is ratified by the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will yield further, I desire to say, of course, that he knows we do more than that in the reservation. We not only reserve liberty of action but we withhold our assent. The reservation expressly says that we withhold our assent to the Shantung provisions of the treaty.

Mr. BORAH. We withhold our assent to them, but the Senator knows when we withhold our assent the treaty goes into force and that Japan has the full protection of the treaty. The only way that we could have stopped it was to refuse to sign the treaty until the Shantung provisions were eliminated.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The treaty is in force now. Any action the United States might take would not affect the matter.

Mr. BORAH. Yes, Mr. President; if the United States had sent the treaty back to Versailles saying that the Shantung provisions should not be in it when the people of the United States ratified it, those provisions would have gone out of it.

Mr. LENROOT. I was discussing the reservation that is now before us and the situation that now confronts us.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely, and what I say is that we do not by our reservation prevent the consummation of the wrong. We can prevent the consummation of the wrong; it is within our power to prevent it, because if we refuse to sign this treaty and send it back to Versailles with the understanding that Shantung shall not be in it when we sign it, Shantung will go out of it. If we will take the stand with reference to Shantung that the President of the United States did, we will see Mr. Lloyd-George and Mr. Millerand and Baron Makino readjusting the condition of affairs. We now occupy a position with reference to Europe where we may sit here in our place of authority upon the Western Continent and save the wreck. If we have a mind to say we will not deal with a treaty which has these conditions in it, one of two things will happen; either they will go out of the treaty, or the United States will have discharged the last ounce of obligation and the last particle of duty that rests upon her as an honorable nation. No taint of dishonor will attach to her.

The trouble is, Mr. President, that when we write this reservation we know precisely what is going on and we know what will continue to go on. We know that the Chinamen are being driven out of Shantung; that ton after ton of opium is being shipped into Shantung; that it is being used for the purpose of drugging the Chinese people, of debauching and degrading them, and we, as a Christian Nation, hope to save our conscience from its everlasting searing by saying "We do not approve of it."

Mr. President, there is one other piece of history since the signing of the armistice which shows how Europe clings to her old principles and policies, and that is in regard to maintaining the Turk in Europe. Is there a man alive who would have supposed, after all the pledges which were made to the Christian world, that France and England would join hands with the bloody power which has been in control of Constantinople for 500 years? It will be remembered that when the Allies replied to President Wilson prior to our entering the war as to the terms upon which they would be willing to make peace, they stated with unity that one of the prerequisites of peace was that the Ottoman Government should be eliminated from Europe. For 500 years the Turks have murdered and massacred the Christian peoples with whom they have come in contact in Europe. Back in 1876, forty-odd years ago, the great Gladstone, in speaking upon this subject, used the following language:

They were, upon the whole—

Speaking of the Turks—

from the black day when they first entered Europe, the one great antihuman specimen of humanity. Wherever they went a broad line of blood marked the track behind them, and as far as their dominion reached civilization disappeared from view. They represented everywhere government by force, as opposed to government by law. For the guide of this life they had a relentless fatalism; for its reward hereafter a sensual paradise.

In closing this wonderful speech Mr. Gladstone said:

But I return to, and I end with, that which is the omega as well as the alpha of this great and most mournful case. An old servant of the Crown and State, I entreat my countrymen, upon whom far more than perhaps any other people of Europe it depends, to require, and to insist, that our Government, which has been working in one direction, shall work in the other, and shall apply all its vigor to concur with the other States of Europe in obtaining the extinction of the Turkish executive power in Bulgaria. Let the Turks now carry away their abuses in the only possible manner, namely, by carrying off themselves. Their Zaptiehs and their Mudirs, their Bimbashis and their Yuzbachis, their Kaimakams and their pashas, one and all, bag and baggage, shall, I hope, clear out from the province they have desolated and profaned. This thorough riddance, this most blessed deliverance, is the only reparation we can make to the memory of those heaps on heaps of dead; to the violated purity alike of matron, of maiden, and of child; to the civilization which has been affronted and shamed; to the laws of God, or, if you like, of Allah; to the moral sense of mankind at large. There is not a criminal in an European gaol, there is not a cannibal in the South Sea Islands, whose indignation would not rise and overboil at the recital of that which has been done, which has too late been examined, but which remains unavenged; which has left behind all the foul and all the fierce passions that produced it, and which may again spring up, in another murderous harvest, from the soil soaked and reeking with blood, and in the air tainted with every imaginable deed of crime and shame. That such things should be done once is a damning disgrace to the portion of our race which did them; that a door should be left open for their ever-so-barely possible repetition would spread that shame over the whole. Better, we may justly tell the Sultan, almost any inconvenience, difficulty, or loss associated with Bulgaria,

"Than thou reseated in thy place of light,
The mockery of thy people, and their bane."

Here I call attention to the words of another Englishman, forty-odd years after the speech of Gladstone, the statement of Viscount Bryce, with reference to Turkish atrocities, which statement was made I think in the year 1915:

The massacres are the result of a policy which, as far as can be ascertained, has been entertained for some considerable time by the gang of unscrupulous adventurers who are now in possession of the Government of the Turkish Empire. They hesitated to put it in practice until they thought the favorable moment had come, and that moment seems to have arrived about the month of April. That was the time when these orders were issued, orders which came down in every case from Constantinople, and which the officials found themselves obliged to carry out on pain of dismissal.

There was no Moslem passion against the Armenian Christians. All was done by the will of the Government, and done not from any religious fanaticism, but simply because they wished, for reasons purely political, to get rid of a non-Moslem element.

* * * * * * *

As I have said, the procedure was exceedingly systematic. The whole Armenian population of each town or village was cleared out, by a house-to-house search. Every inmate was driven into the street. Some of the men were thrown into prison, where they were put to death, sometimes with torture; the rest of the men, with the women and children, were marched out of the town. When they had got some little distance they were separated, the men being taken to some place among the hills where the soldiers, or the Kurdish tribes who were called in to help in the work of slaughter, dispatched them by shooting or bayonetting. The women and children and old men were sent off under convoy of the lowest kind of soldiers—many of them just drawn from gaols—to their distant destination, which was sometimes one of the unhealthy districts in the center of Asia Minor, but more frequently the large desert in the province of Der el Zor, which lies east of Aleppo, in the direction of the Euphrates. They were driven along by the soldiers day after day, all on foot, beaten or left behind to perish if they could not keep up with the caravan; many fell by the way, and many died of hunger. No provisions were given them by the Turkish Government, and they had already been robbed of everything they possessed. Not a few of the women were stripped naked and made to travel in that condition beneath a burning sun. Some of the mothers went mad and threw away their children, being unable to carry them farther. The caravan route was marked by a line of corpses, and comparatively few seem to have arrived at the destinations which had been prescribed for them.

Mr. President, forty-odd years ago that excoriation was pronounced by the then leader of the English thought. Four years ago it was repeated by another distinguished English statesman whom all Americans know and whose views upon such a subject all must respect. These same things were said in a different way, but no less effectively, by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] since the beginning of this war. Yet Europe consents that the Ottoman Government shall continue to have its seat of power in Europe and hold as its capital the city of Constantinople, and to pursue, we must assume, her unbroken and unflagging decimations of all Christian peoples whom she is permitted to reach. The same jealousies between the different powers upon which the Turk has played with such signal success for five centuries, the same willingness to protect the presence of the Turk in Europe for material advantage keeps him in Europe, and if we are to enter the league and become a member of this concert of powers we are to do so with this scourge a part of Europe. A few days ago, even while Lloyd-George was stating in the House of Commons to a shuddering Christian world how this fearful menace was to be revived and protected, even while he spoke, I say, there came over the same wire that carried his speech the account, the shocking, hideous account of another of these indescribable massacres, and we noted among the dead and outraged it was said there were 85 American girls. Words, words, words. Promises, promises, promises. And yet Europe sinks back to her accustomed practices and policies and takes to her bosom the most hideous monster in all the history of mankind. Are we going to join in such a combination? Are we going to sit in a council in which we have but one vote in the hope that that one vote may cleanse the whole situation? Are we going to pledge against these things the sons and daughters of America? Have we not seen enough? Is it not clear now that what they expect of us is that we shall join the league, and thus underwrite not a new Europe, not a "new spirit," not a "new order," but old Europe, with her old order, with her old spirit, with every practice, every policy, and every precept observed and maintained.

Mr. President, to recapitulate, Europe is still Europe, with all her racial antipathies and imperialistic appetites, with the same standards of government, whatever name the Government may bear, and the same strange conceptions of right and justice, in whatever terms she may clothe her schemes of ambition. She is unchanged, and if we assume the task of effectuating a change, save as in the past by whatever power precept and example may exert, we will end by becoming Europeanized in our standards and in our conceptions of civilization or we will fall into disintegration and as a Republic die. If we give up our independence and enter her councils with our one vote, if we surrender our seat of authority here upon the Western Continent, this place of command to which the living God directed our fathers that they, free from all foreign entanglements, might work out a new scheme of government, if we quit our own to stand upon foreign soil, we shall return as our President returned from Versailles, stripped of our principles and shorn of our ideals. Look upon his experience. The thoughtful will gather from it a lesson of deep and lasting significance.

Prior to the ending of the war, as I have indicated, the President had announced the principles upon which world peace could be built, and had solemnly reiterated that upon no others could we hope to compose the world's strife. They were the principles of a just settlement. They met a hearty response among all peoples, but not throughout the courts and chancelleries. He went to Europe to engage face to face those whom he knew would oppose his policies and fight hand to hand against the ancient customs and prejudices of the Old World. He evidently believed he could Americanize European diplomacy, that he could give it a conscience and make it do service for democracy. But the step by which he descended from the most exalted position ever given to man, the freely chosen executive of a hundred and ten million free people, to take his place at the council board of a conclave of European diplomats—the act by which he quit his seat of authority here to enter the stifling, intrigue-ridden atmosphere of Europe were fatal to the most stupendous enterprise that ever rested upon the shoulders of one man. In his place here he was independent, subject not to be outvoted nor misled, master of the situation, and whose views no nation of Europe would have dared disregard. In his place here Europe would have had to come to him, accept his views and conform to his principles, but in Europe he was compelled to accept Europe's views and in the end to adopt Europe's standards and systems. There is no use to deny it, the whole world knows it now—this treaty is not the treaty which the President intended to give the world, neither is it the treaty which will bring peace to the world.

The processes by which all this was accomplished are familiar to students of European affairs—they have not even the quality of newness. They are hoary with the accustomed and accursed practice of centuries. Let those who think it wise to put this Republic into the heart of European intrigue and enmesh and entangle our people in her schemes take time to trace the steps by which that change was brought about. First, the President was hailed on every hand as the deliverer of Europe. Peoples and kings paid homage to the man from whose lips fell, with a new and rare charm, the old gospel of peace on earth and good will to men. But while the reception was in progress, even before the guest had put off his traveling garb, the hosts were framing and maturing their plans and casting lots for the great division. Nay, even before, in anticipation of what would happen after the war, the secret treaties had been written and signed and were concealed to await the propitious hour. The opening act was a bold one—the freedom of the seas, without which the President had said there could be no permanent peace, was arbitrarily and imperiously withdrawn from the consideration of the peace council. All our European associates combined to accomplish this result. The next step was to close the doors upon the conference; it was breaking faith with the whole world, but it was European. From the hour the doors were closed the reins of power passed to other hands than those of the President. His power was that of public opinion, the directing influence of popular judgment. The power of European diplomacy, resting in intrigue, could not succeed without secrecy and could not fail with it. Next, it was found that even a council of 10 was too many—it gave some chance to the President and left some chance for the outside world to get information of what was going on—so the council was reduced to four; in fact, to three. Thus it came about that the President of this Republic, leaving his place of unchallenged power, was found sitting with three European diplomats behind closed doors hermetically sealed in the poisoned and treacherous air of European intrigue divorced from the public and separated from his own people, just as the delegates of this Republic will be every time they trek their way across the Atlantic to the barred doors of Geneva. He is a madman who would transfer the seat of power of this Republic from Washington, upon the Western Continent, to Geneva, in the heart of intriguing Europe. How the whole thing was accomplished, how this world disaster, the peace treaty, as it now appears, was finally brought to its present terms is slowly reaching the world. In any event here it is with our principles announced by the President eliminated and with the seeds of contention and war deftly planted throughout its sinister and imperialistic provisions.

Instead of a treaty of justice and conscience looking to the future peace and tranquillity of the world it is a well-studied and well-executed scheme to destroy an entire people, dedicating the entire continent to famine and hunger and insuring endless turmoil and war. Instead of a treaty upon the humane principles of an American President it is a treaty preserving every vicious principle of European statecraft and through whose every page and paragraph, every open provision, and every covert phrase, vengeance crawls and writhes and hisses. A treaty which puts beneath the brutal feet of power millions of subject peoples and denies liberty and independence to countless millions yet unborn. This is the treaty which Europe exchanged for the treaty which America promised and for which all the world waited. This is the treaty which signifies profoundly what will become of American principles and American policies after a quarter of a century of entangling alliances with the same sinister powers.

Oh, as we love this country of ours, as we would contribute our little in our brief hour of service to the happiness not only of our own people but to liberty-loving people everywhere, as we would do our part to further augment the glory and power of the Government for which Washington fought and Lincoln died, let us stand invincible and forever against the scheme which would plunge us into this maelstrom of European life; not because we would refuse to help Europe but rather because we would serve her and serve all mankind by keeping safe and dominant and independent and free the one great preserving, guiding, moral force of the world in this dark hour—this blessed old Republic.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Idaho would not permit me to interrupt him at the time he was referring to one matter, but I want to take it up now.

He has practically asserted here that Great Britain had annexed Mesopotamia, or had taken over Mesopotamia. I am not exactly certain of the expression which he used; but he has sought to convey to the Senate and to the people of the United States, apparently for the purpose of prejudicing them against this peace settlement, if not against Great Britain, the idea that Great Britain has taken over Mesopotamia, and that the President of the United States, representing the United States in Europe, had become a party to it.

The Senator ought to know, and I can hardly see how he can escape knowing, that the people of Mesopotamia were a race subject to Turkey; that Great Britain was at war with Turkey during the late hostilities; that British armies fought the Turks through Mesopotamia and occupied the country, just as they fought the Turks through Palestine and occupied that country and just as the French fought their way through Syria and occupied that territory; and that those nations—France and Great Britain—merely hold military control over Palestine and Syria and Mesopotamia under the armistice signed in November, 1918, and only until the treaty of peace is finally signed with Turkey. Now, when that treaty of peace is signed with Turkey, if it shall incorporate the League of Nations, as it ought to and as it certainly will if the United States is consulted, Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine will all fall under one of the provisions of the League of Nations which Great Britain and France have both accepted. I refer to article 22:

> To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this covenant.
> The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be intrusted to advanced nations, who by reason of their resources, their experience, or their geographical position can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as mandatories on behalf of the league.

Mr. President, we may not be a party to that treaty; we had no war with Turkey; but the United States was invited to participate in the discussion of the treaty of peace with Bulgaria, and may ultimately be invited to give its assistance in the treaty of peace with Turkey. The Senator can not doubt that if the United States is brought into that every subject people now under the yoke of Turkey will be taken from out that yoke and will be placed under the control of the League of Nations and under mandatories selected under the provisions of the league covenant. The Senator knows that the President of the United States was the author of the mandatory idea. He knows that the President of the United States made a struggle there in Paris for the purpose of establishing the principle that instead of people being held as subject to a conquering nation they should be brought under the trusteeship of the League of Nations; and yet in his speech the Senator from Idaho has sought to heap upon the President of the United States the responsibility for the condition of Mesopotamia, which he says is one of annexation to the British Empire at this time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Of course I wholly differ with the Senator as to who has Mesopotamia and Persia and all that territory, and the Senator is now advocating a doctrine which is advocated by no prominent Englishmen. They do not make any concealment of the fact that those countries have passed under the domination of the British Empire, and will stay there; but that is aside. I am willing for anyone who is interested in the proposition to look up the facts. I did not heap any responsibility upon the President for that. I know what the President was up against. He was up against European diplomacy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall come to that.

The Senator has stated that the President returned from Paris shorn of his ideals and his principles.

It is lamentable if there is any truth in the Senator's statement; but, if it is true, any failure that came to the President over there came to him by reason of the fact that an organized effort was made in the Senate of the United States by the political opponents of the President to discredit him there, and to tear down the strength with which he ought to have been backed by the people of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Very briefly.

Mr. REED. I challenge the Senator to prove the statement he has just made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the existence of the League of Nations is such a showing. There is an organization for the purpose of preserving the peace of the world. There is an organization providing that subject peoples shall not become the victims of colonization and exploitation, but that subject peoples shall be held under mandatories of the league. That is a new ideal in the history of the world; and, Mr. President, I challenge most emphatically the statement by the Senator from Idaho that the Europe of to-day is the Europe of former days. The Europe of to-day is not the Europe of former days.

Mr. BORAH. It is a little worse.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Europe to-day is in the hands of the people of Europe. The Europe of the days of George Washington was an entirely different Europe from the Europe of the present day.

Since the days of George Washington, Great Britain has been practically converted into a democracy. Great Britain now no longer attempts to enforce government upon her colonies as in the days of George Washington she attempted to enforce her dominion upon the colonies that are now the United States. The Great Britain of the present day no longer attempts to tax people without representation, and to-day Great Britain is as much under the control of the public opinion of Great Britain as the United States is under the control of the public opinion of the United States, and more. Her Government responds more quickly to the change of public opinion in Great Britain than the Government of the United States responds to the change of public opinion in the United States.

France has enormously changed since the days when George Washington wrote his Farewell Address. The conquering hero who grew out of the French Revolution was even then, in the full strength of his growing powers, bent upon the conquest of Europe. France has now become a Republic, and in France the opinion of the French people rules the Republic as completely as the opinion of the American people rules the Republic of the United States. They make and change their laws at will, and they topple over their cabinets whenever they do not respond to public opinion in France.

Italy has become a constitutional monarchy, with very limited powers; and so has Spain, and so has Holland, and so has Belgium, and so have the Scandinavian countries. All of the countries of Europe have practically become democracies, and the kings in those countries are mere figureheads. As I have said before, they have no more real power than the painted kings upon a deck of cards. Germany, the conquering empire, lies crushed in the dust, and the German people have control of their Government to-day. The Austrian Empire has also been crushed and her subject peoples relieved. Ancient Poland has been reconstituted into a republic, and so, also, ancient Bohemia. Self-government for those countries has come as the result of this war. The Czar of Russia, autocratic and powerful in the days of Napoleon, has gone, and autocracy has gone, and slowly Russia is emerging, through the throes of a terrible revolution, into the status of a self-governing republic.

Europe is not the same as it once was. The people of Europe have gained the control over their governments. Conquest is no longer the dream of the governments in Europe as it once was. They are now striving to please their people. They are compelled to do so or they will be toppled from power. So I resent the statement of the Senator from Idaho that Europe now is the same as the Europe of former days.

What has become of all the petty monarchies and tyrants that existed through central Europe in those days? What has become of the Austrian Empire that waged so many wars of conquest? What has become of Spain, which, even in Washington's day, was trying to hold her possessions in the western world? They have all been compelled to abandon those policies, and to-day Europe is in the control of democracies, just as the Western Hemisphere is in the control of democracies.

So, I say to the Senator from Idaho, we can very well, as the great, dominant democracy of the western world, enter into a contract with these democracies to preserve the peace of the world. We can bring to them our altruism and our idealism. If we become a member of this league, our influence will be the dominant influence in it.

We have brought about the league; American sentiment behind the President of the United States has made the league possible; and nothing but political jealousies and antagonisms and personal bitterness and animosity can prevent the United States from entering the league. When the United States enters it it will be the paramount and powerful influence in it, because the United States is the natural leader of the world in these great moral affairs.

Mr. President, the example of the United States is one which has aided in redeeming Europe from the tyrannies of the past and the period of conquest of the past, and the United States must go into this league and bear its great share in introducing this new era into the history of the world.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is looking to the past instead of the future. He does not realize the mighty change that has come to Europe. His assertion that Europe to-day is what it was in former times proves that he does not appreciate the tremendous changes over there. Does he not know that the people of those European countries are just as determined to dictate to their Governments what they shall do as are the people of the United States? Does he not know that those people are just as much injured by militarism as we would be, that they have the same desire to get away from militarism that our people have, that they have the same desire to escape from the taxes which come with war that we have? Does he not know that the interests of the people of those European countries are the same as the interests of the people of the United States?

Peace, prosperity, production—those are the things the people of Europe long for, and as they control their Governments just as the people of the United States control our Government, there is no reason why we can not enter into a compact with them, as set forth in this covenant, for the purpose of preserving the peace of the world and introducing the new era of peace and good will among men.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, when I see an American Senator stand on the floor of this Chamber and hear him declare that Great Britain has a freer government than ours, I wonder why he does not leave the United States and live under the Union Jack. If I believed that, I would advocate the crowning of an American king, and the establishment of a hereditary House of Lords, and a hereditary titled and landed aristocracy. I would take from the walls of my home the pictures of George Washington and Jefferson and Lincoln and Jackson. I would haul down the American flag, get a passport to England, and embark for "dear old Lunnon, don'cha know," where I would feel at home. I am utterly sick and disgusted with this talk of Great Britain having a better government and a more democratic government than the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, of course, the Senator does not quote me correctly. I said they respond more quickly to public opinion. We elect our public officers for a certain number of years, and they occupy their places for a term of years; no matter how much public opinion changes, they are still in office. But the British cabinet, which is the power in Great Britain, depends simply upon the British House of Commons, and the British House of Commons can only exist as long as it is in harmony with public opinion. It has no office for any definite number of years.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; it does not——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not want the Senator from Missouri to misrepresent me. What I say is that public opinion rules Great Britain, and her Government necessarily is more quickly responsive to changes of public opinion, because her officers hold their offices for no definite number of years.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator, then, prefer the "more responsive Government" of Great Britain to the Government of the United States? If not, what do his words mean? But let the Senator's words which he uttered a while ago and those he uttered this moment stand, and let my criticism stand, and let the public judge between us.

You can turn out the British Government sooner than you can the American Government, can you?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Very much.

Mr. REED. How soon can they turn out the House of Lords?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator forgets that the House of Lords has ceased to be a power in Great Britain.

Mr. REED. I do not forget anything of the kind, because the fact never existed to be forgotten.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has. The House of Lords has only a very limited veto power as to legislation which passes through the House of Commons, and which the House of Lords is compelled to bow to. The House of Lords ceased to be a power five years ago.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Nebraska has become so infatuated with the League of Nations that I have not the slightest doubt but that he would change the very structure of the Government of the Republic to set up the supergovernment of the league.

What an idle statement it is to say that the British House of Lords has ceased to be of any importance. Does the Senator presume on the ignorance of everybody but his own self? The House of Lords has been shorn of its authority to just this extent: The right it had sought to usurp over money bills was yielded and it was provided that if the Commons in three successive sessions passes a bill, the House of Lords can not defeat it after it has been passed the third time, provided two years have elapsed since its first passage. Outside of that the ancient and tremendous authority of the House of Lords stands unimpaired. The men who occupy the seats there are born to their places of power. They are there not because they represent the public opinion of Great Britain, but because they were born of a particular father and mother. That particular variety of father and mother have always taught their offspring to believe they are of clay superior to that of which God created ordinary mortals. That doctrine they sucked from the bosoms of their mothers. That doctrine is a fundamental of the British system of government.

The Senator says that a body of men whose concurrence in every important act of legislation must be secured save in the instances I have spoken of are more responsive to public opinion than are the Members of the American Congress. Does the Senator think that the King of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, Emperor of India, and so forth, born to his position, is more responsive to public opinion than is the President of the United States, who must be elected by the people, and who always keeps one and sometimes both ears to the ground in a painful attempt to learn just what the people are thinking about on all important questions? Try to get in to see his majesty the King, born to the purple, asserting the divine right to rule, even yet proclaiming the infamous and profane doctrine that God Almighty selected him and his breed as the special favorites of heaven, and thereupon poured upon his head the "divine petroleum of authority," thereby giving him the right to lord it over millions of men better than him or any of his ancestors, including the late lamented George III.

It is astonishing to hear it declared in this Chamber that such a government is superior to that established by Washington.

Ah, but they say, Mr. President, that the King has not much power; as in the past, that he must act through his minister. That statement is largely true; nevertheless he has yet a tremendous power. Indeed, his power is so great over the minds of the British people that when he changes the color of his gloves all of the dandies of the British Empire rush to the nearest haberdasher for gloves of similar color. Just as he affects by his example, just as he affects by his prestige and power the fashions of the land, he affects to a large extent the thought of that country.

The Senator from Nebraska refers to the House of Commons. True, the House of Commons is elected, but for a term of five years. It is also true that a new election can be forced if the Government is defeated. But what does history show? They have had Parliaments there and Governments that have stood year in and year out that have successfully resisted great popular demands. The very ministry is often for all practical purposes handed down through families. Lord Salisbury, three times prime minister, was succeeded by his nephew, Balfour. It is generally only after great effort that the British people are able to effect any real reform. It required almost a century of bitter struggle to accomplish the great reforms of recent times, although during all of that time the majority of the people cried out for relief. They would have been effected in the United States in one single congressional election; at the longest in one presidential campaign.

Let the pro-Britishers who teach the infamous doctrine that monarchial government is better than republican government leave the United States. Let them go now whether they are Members of the Senate or not. Perhaps they can get raised to the peerage and become eligible to the House of Lords.

I remember a speech made by the Senator from Nebraska a number of years ago in which he placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a series of magazine articles written by Andrew Carnegie advocating the return of America to the mother country, Great Britain. The Senator warned us against agreeing to a treaty that had been negotiated with Great Britain. He warned that the treaty was a step in the scheme of Andrew Carnegie and men of his type to place this country back again under the British flag. He denounced the articles and denounced the treaty. He warned us against entering into the treaty because he saw in it a menace to American independence.

He sounded the doctrine of nationalism and poured forth the vials of anathema upon Andrew Carnegie and men who treasonably taught the unspeakable doctrine that we should return to the British flag. His voice was then the voice in clarion tones of an American patriot. It has become the miserable, puling, whining whisper of a British sycophant, praising the Government of Great Britain as better than the Government of that country whose flag has protected him from birth and whose people have honored him with a great office of influence and power.

Says the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, who has been prophesying now for eight months about this treaty—and who has never yet had a prophecy come true—the nations of Europe will in the future be governed by disinterested and enlightened policies; that "their hearts have changed." When did they change? Whence does the Senator from Nebraska get his evidence of change? Here is what the President said on the 10th day of February, speaking of and concerning these particular Britishers whose flag has now, according to the Senator, become a better emblem of liberty than the old Stars and Stripes. To such a degree has the deadly doctrine of internationalism poisoned the pure fountains of patriotism from which Nebraska's senior Senator was wont to drink. The President says that the old order of things in Europe which brought so many evils on the world has not changed. What says the President in regard to this change of the European heart? I put him on the witness stand; I call him to the tribunal; I confound the statement we have just been hearing by the statement of the President:

> It is time to speak with the utmost frankness. The Adriatic issue as it now presents itself raises the fundamental question as to whether the American Government can on any terms cooperate with its European associates in the great work of maintaining the peace of the world or removing the primary causes of war. * * * If substantial agreement on what is just and reasonable is not to determine international issues, if the country possessing the most endurance in pressing its demands rather than the country armed with a just cause is to gain the support of the powers, if forcible seizure of coveted areas is to be permitted and condoned and is to receive ultimate justification by creating a situation so difficult that decision favorable to the aggressor is deemed a practical necessity; if deliberately incited ambition is, under the name of national sentiment, to be rewarded at the expense of the small and the weak; if, in a word, the old order of things which brought so many evils on the world is still to prevail, then the time is not yet come when this Government can enter a concert of powers the very existence of which must depend upon a new spirit and a new order.
> The American people are willing to share in such high enterprise, but many among them are fearful lest they become entangled in international policies and committed to international obligations foreign alike to their ideals and their traditions. To commit them to such a policy as that embodied in the latest Adriatic proposals and to obligate them to maintain injustice as against the claims of justice would be to provide the most solid ground for such fears. This Government can undertake no such grave responsibility.

Thus the President indicts the present ruling powers of Europe for a deliberate act of injustice and wrong and infamy so grave as to prove that they still cling to the old order of affairs.

Thus he warns them that unless they immediately recede and reform America can not enter their councils or undertake in the future to cooperate with them. And yet, with a bland assurance that would do credit to the proverbial brass monkey, the Senator from Nebraska stands here and tells us that the old order has passed away and the hearts of Europe's kings have been changed. With the President now threatening to withdraw this treaty because the old order yet obtains, and because the old Adam of European diplomacy is still an active and controlling influence, the Senator from Nebraska talks about the high ideals of Europe; the championship by Europe of the principles of democracy, equality, and justice.

I observe that as usual the Senator from Nebraska has left the forum. [Laughter.]

What is a democracy? It is a country where all the people who are under the Government are permitted to participate in the Government equally, fairly, impartially.

Where the citizens do not possess that right there is no democracy, there is no republicanism; there is some other kind of government. It may be a despotism; it may be an autocracy; it may be a qualified despotism; but it is not a democracy. The moment a government denies to the people the right to set up and participate in the government it ceases to be democratic. The people are reduced to the condition of slaves.

Let us apply that to this loudly proclaimed democracy of Great Britain. There are in England and in Scotland and Wales a total of 42,000,000 Britishers. There is in all the British Empire, including Australia, Canada, and New Zealand, a total of approximately 65,000,000.

Australia, however, does not completely rule herself; Canada does not completely rule herself; New Zealand does not completely rule herself. In every instance the King or the Government of the British Isles holds a dominating control, so that the 42,000,000 Britishers in England and Scotland and Wales really are supreme over the Empire. How many people are held as conquered subjects by this British democracy that so suits the views and jumps with the opinions of the Senator from Nebraska? Great Britain holds in thralldom 387,000,000 human beings who have no voice in the Government that rules over them; 387,000,000 people who are forced to obey the will and are subject to the command of 42,000,000 Britishers who live from three to nine thousand miles away from their lands. Their cities were seized at the point of the sword; their lands were conquered by the trained soldiers of Great Britain, just as Rome's invincible legions swept over the face of the earth; even their local government has been torn from their hands; they are British serfs.

Why, sir, 1,100 Britishers, resident in India, control over 290,000,000 protesting people.

This is what talking for a League of Nations and talking for internationalism, as opposed to nationalism, does. Such has been the corrupting result upon the mind of the Senator from Nebraska. If we had a few more weeks of discussion on this question, the Senator from Nebraska would probably conclude that the Emperor of Japan is a better democrat than was George Washington.

Has England changed? Turn your eyes to Persia. Within the last six months Great Britain has laid her hand upon the throat of Persia, and that ancient people is brought beneath her flag. Has England changed and become a democracy in spirit? Behold they are arresting the representatives of 11,000,000 Egyptians because, forsooth, they come to the doors where sit the arbiters of the world's fate to ask that they be given the liberty Great Britain swore she would never take from them. With a mockery of facts, with an utter contempt for history, does the Senator from Nebraska stand upon this floor and tell us that Great Britain is as much of a democracy as is the United States.

When the United States shall send her conquering armies over the earth; when with fire and sword she shall devastate the cities and the fields of other peoples; when she shall rivet the steel manacles of her power upon the wrists of subjects and of slaves; when she shall send her flag forth, not as a banner of liberty, but as the ensign of human slavery; when she shall create vast fleets of war to threaten every weak nation and to thunder with her guns against the unprotected cities of defenseless people; when she shall pursue that cruel and imperialistic thing, then you may compare her with Great Britain. But while she is sending her sons forth to die for the liberty of others, while she is proclaiming to all the world that she desires no foot of territory and is willing to spend her blood and her treasure to aid the cause of weakness and despair, let no man dare compare the United States with the modern Rome.

There is as much difference between the fundamental thought of the United States with reference to other peoples, and her beneficent and protecting policy, and that spirit of aggression and conquest which inspires the heart of Great Britain, as there is between the shepherd dog that guards the sheep at night and dies in their defense and the grey wolf that comes to tear their throats and suck their blood.

Look at Ireland: Are her protesting people granted their liberty? Are they accorded self-determination? Is not the century-old struggle of the Irish for freedom being to-day met by the old argument of the bayonet; the logic of force; the persuasion of prison cells? Is she to-day not confronted by the worst of all despotisms—the despotism of martial law?

When did Great Britain change? Certainly, if she has changed at all it must have been since the 10th day of February, when the President wrote the letter I have just read. Either the President of the United States when he wrote that letter indicting the Government of Great Britain for being controlled by the old principles of selfishness and greed penned a thing that was infamously false or else the Senator from Nebraska has not a leg of logic or of fact upon which to stand.

"England's Government as good as that of the United States!" Well, go there, ye who love that Government. If I believed there was a better government in the world than mine, I would stay here and try to make mine like it, or else I would go to that other government. American Senators are now found decrying their own Government and declaring that a government by kings and a titled aristocracy is better than this Government by and for the people. Thus early do we pluck bitter fruit from the poison tree of internationalism. That Great Britain will be a great controlling force in the league every man knows who has any sense at all. She has by this war added 3,000,000 square miles of territory to her dominion and brought more than 50,000,000 more subjects under her iron sway.

Now, let me introduce you to another modern democracy—Japan. I want to present a picture to the country: The distinguished Senator from Nebraska, his gray hair fanned by the breezes of his native State, is walking down the streets of the beautiful city of Omaha, leading by the hand the Mikado of all Japan; a band is playing the Japanese national air, while small boys proudly bear banners emblazoned "HITCHCOCK and the Mikado, the Siamese twins of democracy." Japan has become a democracy since when? I do not know how long the present ruling house of Japan has held dominion in that country. Can the Senator from Massachusetts inform me?

Mr. LODGE. I can not give the Senator the exact date, but the present dynasty dates back to about the time of the beginning of the Christian era, I think.

Mr. REED. Yes; ever since Christ was crucified the same family has held undisputed the scepter of despotism over Japan and her people; the power of life and of death; the power over the souls and consciences of that people, for the Mikado of Japan has been worshiped as much as a Jap is capable of worshiping anything.

He was and is the terrestrial god of the Japanese people, standing as the vice-regent of those spirits or powers or forces which the Japanese religion teaches rule the universe. I suppose the Senator from Nebraska imagines the Japanese change their officers more readily than we can. A man has to have an imagination of that kind who can see a reason for pulling down the American flag and running up the treasonable banner of internationalism.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator asked me a question a while ago, but at that time I could not give him the exact date he was desirous of knowing.

Mr. REED. I knew the Senator could find it.

Mr. LODGE. I now discover that the Japanese claim that their Empire was founded by the first Emperor, Jimmu Tennō, 660 B. C., and that the dynasty founded by him still reigns. That is sufficiently old for the Senator's purposes, I presume. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Yes; we observe that it is a democracy; that the will of the people easily control and change.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; a democracy.

Mr. REED. That is quite an old democracy; I did not know there was so old a one in all the world.

Mr. LODGE. It is a very old one.

Mr. REED. Let me read what has been taught. Just a short excerpt from Keane:

> In Japan Shintoism, as reformed in recent times and almost merged in the Bushidoism, now affected by the educated classes, has become much more a political institution than a religious system. The Kami-No-Michi, or "The Way of the Gods" or "Spirits," is inseparably bound up with the political interests of the reigning dynasty, sprung from the sun goddess; hence its three cardinal virtues are:

1. Honor the Kami (spirits), of whom the Emperor is the chief representative on earth.
2. Revere him as thy sovereign.
3. Obey his will, and that is the only duty of man.

That is a good creed for a Democrat. [Laughter.] Vox populi, vox dei!

There is no moral code, and loyal expositors have declared that the Mikado's will is the supreme or only test of right and wrong.

This is the modern democracy!

But the Senator will say they have changed. When? When did they change?

Here is an article from the Associated Press of last Sunday, February 29:

The fight in Japan for universal suffrage resulted in the dissolution of the Japanese Diet last Thursday by Imperial decree. The Emperor's action was taken at the request of Premier Hara.

* * * * * * *

The Government last month brought forward a measure extending the right of franchise to Japanese males whose direct tax exceeded 3 yen. Although excluding the entire body of labor, this measure was described as a considerable enlargement of the old and restricted suffrage list. * * *

That was the Government's proposition—that those who paid taxes amounting to 3 yen could vote, provided they did not do honest labor, but any man who worked with his hands and who did honest toil could not vote in this oriental "democracy" which the Senator from Nebraska states ought to be our partner.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. Let me finish reading this dispatch, and then I will yield.

So that over there in this "republic" of Japan, this "democracy" of the Orient, the most advanced reformers do not dare, apparently, to ask for anybody the privilege of voting unless he can pay taxes and unless he does not labor.

I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator from Missouri to give thanks that even under the new dispensation the military have not been invoked for the control of recalcitrant Senators; otherwise the Senator might be in jeopardy.

Mr. REED. Not yet; although I heard a suggestion of "gibbets built as high as heaven, but pointed in another direction," on which Senators were to be hung, apparently upside down, because that would be the direction in which they would be pointing. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GORE. I think a fact ought to go into the RECORD at this place, which I do not think the Senator has stated, that in Japan to-day, under the existing laws and constitution, only one and a half million men are permitted to vote out of a total of 20,000,000 having the qualification of age.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

But that is not all there is to this Japanese "democracy." Japan had a total population prior to the war of 60,000,000.

She had subject peoples—that is, political slaves, if not actual slaves—to the number of 46,000,000. She has acquired under this treaty 36,603,000 subjects. And that as a democracy, "her spirit has been changed and regenerated," "the new day has come," and yet at this moment the listening ear can catch the sound of the hammers riveting the shackles upon Shantung and upon Korea! A few weeks ago, according to the report of the Foreign Missionary Society and according to the report of the Federal Association of Christian Churches, this reformed and regenerated people were stripping native Christian girls naked and lashing them with bamboo rods until the flesh fell from their bones because they worshipped that Christ who was born 600 years after this dynasty was planted to curse the earth! They were, according to these missionary reports, forcing iron rings down upon the arms of native Christian men until the blood was forced back into the surcharged heart, producing a death agony equal to crucifixion!

That is a democracy, according to the Nebraska Senator. That is the new spirit and the new order. Behold, the herald of the new day comes in the form of a Jap, bearing in one hand bamboo rods wet with the blood of Christian girls and in the other the sword of the executioner!

The Senator tells us that Italy has been reformed, that it is "in favor of the new day," and "that a new spirit thrills that people"; and yet the President of the United States declares that he is about to withdraw this treaty because of the sordid, cruel Old World appetite and demand of Italy, manifested in Italy's demand for Fiume and other territory. With the President so certifying, the distinguished Senator from Nebraska pronounces a eulogy upon the new Italian democracy.

The Senator tells us that Russia is imbued with the new spirit. Now, I grant you that Russia is imbued with a new spirit, and that the Romanoffs no longer occupy the throne of that vast country; but if Russia is imbued with the new spirit, and if the light that shines from the cross of Jesus Christ now is the guide of Russia—if she has been regenerated and changed—I want to know why our Government sent troops into Russia, not all of them yet withdrawn, to attack a government which, according to the Senator from Nebraska, represents the new and glorious era of brotherly love. Why did the British Empire, which he says is now the chief evangel of the doctrine of international good will and equity, send its serried columns into Russia? Why did our brother, Japan—equally now, according to the Senator from Nebraska, the John the Baptist of the new reform—why did these three nations, from three separate sides, attack Russia, if Russia be the pure, the tender, the sweet abiding place of love and progress?

Mr. President, I hope that out of the struggle and the war and the bitterness Russia will emerge. I hope that as she comes forth from the troubled waters she will be regenerated. But surely it does not lie in the mouth of any defender of the President to say that the government that is now in Russia is an enlightened and glorious and splendid government, representing the new day, and to so say before our invading troops are yet withdrawn from her soil.

Mr. President, I think that is all I want to say about these new democracies. We have set up some experiments in government. Some of them may succeed. They may all succeed. I hope they will succeed; but every man understands what their influence will be in the League of Nations. They are not in the League of Nations as controlling forces. They are there as wards requiring protection. They will have no more to say in the League of Nations than they have had to say outside of it. They will have but little more to say for many years than an infant waif has to say about the treatment it will be accorded by the household at whose door it has been abandoned. They will be told then, as the President now tells Italy, that they must obey the will of the great powers. They will be told then, as the President recently told Roumania and Serbia, that they must submit to having their internal policies determined, because the great powers had to furnish the men to defend them. So I do not count them as much of an accession to the League of Nations.

It is perfectly fair to say—and I want to be fair—that the reduction of the power of Germany and Austria has been that much of an advance; but that is not an argument in favor of the creation of a great world international government. It is an argument against it, for we remove any necessity for a great combination of powers. If Germany in fact lies stricken, or if Germany in fact has been regenerated and washed in the holy waters of absolution and of repentance, if she is what the Senator from Nebraska declares her to be now—a Republic of the people, inspired by the ideals of love for all the people of the world—then she is no longer a menace to the world, and there is no need of leagues of nations or armaments to defend the world against her.

It is only because it is claimed that she has not been reformed, that she has not been changed, that she is still inspired by the ideals of her military masters of the past and therefore may spring again into the arena full armed and terrible, that there is any argument that can be made for the League of Nations. But the Senator destroys all that, cuts all that ground from under his own feet, and removes the last argument there is in favor of this thing called the League of Nations by declaring that Germany is no longer a menace to the world because she, too, is a sister democracy.

What utter rot is all this, what kind of argument is it? You contend for a little while that the world is menaced by Germany and therefore we must have a League of Nations, and in the next breath argue that the world is regenerated and democratized because Germany has been transformed into a democracy of equality and love.

The Senators arguing for a League of Nations remind me, every time one of them gets on his feet, of Æsop's fable of an ancient animal that had a set of legs on his back and a set of legs on his belly. When pursued, it ran upon the legs on its belly; when they grew tired, it flopped over on its back and ran on the other set of legs; when they grew weary, over it went again to its belly legs. Accordingly, it could never be caught.

When it suits these gentlemen to say that Germany is a democracy, they so declare without a blush; when it suits them to say Germany is a great menace to the world, inspired by the military ideals of her masters of the past and devoted to the doctrine of destroying the world with fire and with steel, they say that with a brazen effrontery so natural as to resemble modesty.

Mr. President, again we hear the cry that was first started here, I think, by the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], that those of us who oppose the League of Nations are looking toward the past while they, bright angels and heralds of the new and glorious day, turn their faces to the sunrise. In truth, they turn their faces to what a British statesman said was admittedly a leap in the dark. They turn their faces to what a British statesman said was admittedly a reversal of the policies of the fathers of the Republic. They turn their faces toward a capital of the world established at Geneva, over which will fly an international flag and beneath which will be assembled the political representatives of the monarchies, the republics, the Bolshevists of the world. They turn their faces to a tribunal that will govern in European affairs and in American affairs, that will sit in secret, and from its closets of secrecy issue its decrees of power. They turn their faces toward a tribunal that is already gathering in its hands powers almost of omnipotence over nations of the world. They turn their faces to a closet where a majority of five men out of a council of nine can control the destinies of these peoples.

Austria's treaty provides for the internal government of Austria, and that a failure to comply with the demands of that instrument shall constitute an international question justiciable by the council of the League of Nations and determinable by a majority of that council. A similar treaty has been forced upon Hungary, a like treaty has been forced upon Poland and upon Jugo-Slavia.

Similar treaties have been exacted from Roumania and Serbia. Both of them were our associates in this war. Thus the internal affairs of these six several countries are declared to constitute international questions and to be justiciable by five men meeting in the capital of a league of the world over which will float a flag that will soon assert over the world a primacy such as is now asserted over these six several countries. If the League of Nations is to have jurisdiction of Turkey with its hordes, of Palestine, of Armenia, of other countries, now too weak to resist, then indeed these five men sitting in Europe in secret will control a population probably greater than that of the United States. When five men picked by five foreign Governments, constituting a majority of the council, can control the fate of millions of people, that is a democracy according to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

O you Senators of Texas, whose soil was baptized by the bravest blood ever drawn from human veins, whose men preferred to die in the Alamo rather than to surrender the liberties they had gained, to what a pass have we come when we propose to help set up a superworld government that is growing in power more rapidly than has any government in all the history of the world.

Senators of America, are you willing it shall dominate the foreign policies of your land? Are you willing to surrender to it the sovereignty your fathers established? That, sir, is the way the new reformers are turning their faces. They say we look backward. Yes, Mr. President, we look backward. We look back to the days when men said that rather than be even taxed by Great Britain they would die the death.

We look back to the glorious fields of the Revolution. We look back to the hours when American women stood in their cabin doors and beat back the native savage and kept the homes while the fathers stood with Washington upon the battle front. We look back to those birth hours of liberty, when from the womb of holy patriotism there sprang the infant giant America. We look back to forests that were conquered, to mountains that were leveled, to streams that were bridged, to a continent conquered, to vast cities raised by the magic of genius, to churches and schoolhouses that crown the hills of a vast land. We look to homes where men and women have lived in equality and in liberty. We look to all the world and see the oppressed of every land turning their eyes to us, gaining inspiration from our example and strength to break their masters' chains. This is the past to which we look, and standing towering above the picture is the majestic form of George Washington, father of this Republic, the greatest of the dead, incomparably the superior of any of the living.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 3, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, draw near to us as we draw near to Thee, that we may drink deep of the fountain of life; be purified, ennobled, strengthened for the arduous duties Thou hast laid upon us, with greater faith in Thee, less doubt; greater hope, less despair; greater love for mankind, less hate; more generosity, less selfishness; more charity, less spite; more good, less bad; that we may push on toward the goal of perfection, in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a resolution adopted by the American Legion Post at Miami, Tex., with reference to return of the bodies of the soldiers killed in France.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the resolution referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, a great many of these petitions are presented. I get them, and a great many other Members of the House get them, and if we are going to print them in the RECORD we will have nothing but these petitions in there. The matter is being considered now by the Ways and Means Committee, and hearings will be had, and these petitions should go to that committee.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It is not with reference to the bonus, but with reference to the return of the bodies of the soldiers. It is a short resolution opposing the return of the bodies.

Mr. DYER. I think on these matters, Mr. Speaker, I shall be forced to object.

CORRECTION.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, the RECORD, on page 3782, would indicate that the consideration of the item for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce had been concluded on yesterday. For instance, it says:

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.
The Clerk read as follows:
"Steamboat inspectors: For 11 supervising inspectors, at $3,450 each, $37,950."

My recollection of the situation is that when the House adjourned that we were still considering the item of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] had some additional amendments to offer.

The SPEAKER. That will come up in the committee.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Ought we not to ascertain the status of the correctness of the RECORD at this time in that regard? It is a matter that can be very easily verified and disposed of, I should think.

The SPEAKER. The only way of correcting it would be by the reporter's notes, in the opinion of the Chair. I think when the House goes into committee that can be settled.

Mr. DUPRÉ. If the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] will give heed, I was directing the attention of the Chair to the fact that the RECORD seems to indicate that we had concluded consideration of the item of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce when we adjourned on yesterday.

Mr. SISSON. That is not true.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The gentleman from Mississippi confirms my statement as to the inaccuracy of the RECORD.

Mr. SISSON. I had not looked at the RECORD, but here is what occurred.

The SPEAKER. The only question is the correction of the RECORD.

Mr. SISSON. But in order that we may have the RECORD corrected, here is exactly what happened: I was on my feet offering an amendment to increase the item from $50,000 to $100,000, and at that point the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] made the point of no quorum; then the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] moved that the committee rise, and I was on my feet at the time the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] made the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. That can be corrected when we go into committee. The Chairman of the committee will recognize the fact.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The RECORD should be corrected in this respect. It says:

The Clerk read as follows:
"Steamboat inspectors: For 11 supervising inspectors, at $3,450 each, $37,950."

If that were stricken from the RECORD it would be perfectly clear.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to correct the RECORD by striking out the words suggested. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the question is, What are the facts? The RECORD indicates that the Clerk proceeded to read. Now, is that fact denied?

Mr. SISSON. No; it is not. I was standing down in front of this table and was offering the amendment to increase the amount from $50,000 to $100,000, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] made the point of no quorum, and when he made the point of no quorum the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] moved that the committee rise.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I made the point immediately after the conclusion of the reading of the paragraph as indicated by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ], and the Clerk, if he attempted to read, had no right to read after the point of order was made that there was no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the fact is that after this item was completed and the Clerk had started to read the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] raised the point of no quorum. In the first place, he said something across the aisle to me in reference to the committee rising, and the question was raised, and I asked that the committee rise.

Mr. SISSON. I was on my feet offering the amendment at that moment, and the Clerk had not read a line, because I was watching very carefully, and immediately upon concluding the words "$50,000" I addressed the Chair, when Mr. BLANTON instantly made the point of no quorum. There was some little confusion, but I insist I was offering the amendment at that time. Several gentlemen said, "You will not lose your rights." And at that moment the point of no quorum was made and the committee rose; and they said, "You will be recognized when the committee meets again."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the whole matter could be cleared up if the gentleman from Indiana would indicate to the gentleman from Mississippi that he would have no objection to an amendment being offered to the paragraph in question.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say that my memory of the transaction is just exactly as the RECORD discloses. The Clerk proceeded to read. I do not want to take any advantage in the matter, and I have no objection to the RECORD being corrected.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the correction asked for? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

TRANSFER OF MOTOR-PROPELLED VEHICLES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill S. 3037.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up a conference report on a bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on the bill (S. 3037) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer, free of charge, certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to the Department of Agriculture, Post Office Department, Navy Department, and the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service, and certain other surplus property to the Department of Agriculture, and for other purposes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do the minority members of the committee know that the gentleman was going to call this matter up this morning?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is the minority member on the conference, and he signed the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the statement instead of the report?

There was no objection.

The statement was read.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3037) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer, free of charge, certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to the Department of Agriculture, Post Office Department, Navy Department, and the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service, and certain other surplus property to the Department of Agriculture, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of section 5 of the House amendment add the following: "Provided, That any State highway department to which is assigned motor-propelled vehicles and other equipment and supplies, transferred herein to the Department of Agriculture, may, in its discretion, arrange for the use of such vehicles and equipment, for the purpose of constructing or maintaining public highways, with any State agency or municipal corporation at a fair rental which shall not be less than the cost of maintenance and repair of said vehicles and equipment"; and the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives at a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to S. 3037, An act to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer, free of charge, certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to the Department of Agriculture, Post Office Department, Navy Department, and the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service, and certain other surplus property to the Department of Agriculture, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate accepted the House amendment to the title of the bill and also agreed to the amendment of the House with a proviso at the end of section 5 of the House amendment, as follows:

"Provided, That any State highway department to which is assigned motor-propelled vehicles and other equipment and supplies, transferred herein to the Department of Agriculture, may, in its discretion, arrange for the use of such vehicles and equipment, for the purpose of constructing or maintaining public highways, with any State agency or municipal corporation at a fair rental which shall not be less than the cost of maintenance and repair of said vehicles and equipment."

Your conferees agreed to the proviso. This was the only change to the language of the bill as it left the House.

JULIUS KAHN,
JOHN C. MCKENZIE,
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman explain to the House just what are the points in disagreement, and how they were adjusted?

Mr. KAHN. There were quite a number of points of difference upon which the House managers refused to yield and which the Senate conferees ultimately dropped. But this provision upon which we yielded allows the State highway commissions to rent some of the machinery, the motor vehicles, to some of the municipal corporations for road-building purposes, and also allows them to use some of the motor vehicles for road building in the States on conditions fixed by the highway commissions of those States.

Mr. GARD. Does that include all the different classes of municipal corporations in the United States?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does it permit the renting of them to those road-building concerns generally, or is it confined to municipal corporations?

Mr. KAHN. It is confined entirely to municipal corporations.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Has the gentleman yet received any information as to what surplus stock of this character the War Department has that can be turned over?

Mr. KAHN. I have been informed that there is very little that is left; and yet I have been informed by Members of the House who have been to Camp Holabird and other places where this material is stored that there is seemingly a large amount of material.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The statement was made in the House recently by some Member—I do not recollect who—which apparently gave the information that there was practically nothing now left in the War Department. I think the statement was read by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. KAHN. That is my information.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I asked the question because I just wondered what the effect of this kind of legislation will be. The States generally throughout the country, I think, have deferred purchasing equipment, thinking that they might obtain it under the provisions of this law when enacted. Now, if we pass the law and there is no equipment, it would look to me as though we were acting very foolishly.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly there are some motor vehicles left, and probably there is a good quantity of road-building material that is on hand.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman mean equipment to build roads with?

Mr. KAHN. I mean machines for mixing concrete and material of that kind.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will ask the gentleman if this is not the situation, that the War Department has declared these trucks, as they have declared their typewriters and furniture, and so forth, surplus for the War Department, but not surplus for sale? It is a fact that there are thousands and thousands of trucks at Indianapolis, and yet when you ask for a report from the War Department they tell you there is no surplus at Indianapolis.

It seems they have not enough surplus for the War Department. During this year they have purchased 75 new trucks, paying as high as $8,000 apiece for those trucks, notwithstanding the fact that they have all these thousands and thousands of trucks at these different store places.

Mr. KAHN. I understand that such a condition exists, and the Committee on Military Affairs yesterday agreed to report out a resolution calling for the information that the gentleman refers to.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. This is the information we gather, that they are declaring all this property surplus for the War Department and intended to hold it as surplus for the War Department until it is determined what the size of the new Army is to be; that they are holding in store surplus for an Army of 575,000 men. That is as we get it.

Mr. KAHN. The War Department for the last year has sent in estimates for such an Army, but no member of the committee has ever agreed to such a large standing army in peace times.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What excuse have they given for purchasing these 75 new-fangled trucks this year in view of the fact that they already have so many surplus trucks on hand?

Mr. KAHN. I say the Committee on Military Affairs yesterday agreed to report a resolution to the House calling for the information desired. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has no information on the subject.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Can not the chairman of the committee summon these gentleman before the committee and have them make a statement with reference to why they are doing these things?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They would not have the information.

Mr. KAHN. I say that the committee has sent to the War Department for the very information that the gentleman speaks of, but has not received a reply as yet.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BEE. I notice that in this amendment this language is used, that they shall have the right to arrange for the use of such vehicles with any State agency or municipal corporation at a fair rental. This rental will only be the amount of the cost of maintenance and repair, and otherwise it is submitted to them free?

Mr. KAHN. The State board of highway commissioners are permitted to charge a rental for this material if it is to be used by a municipal corporation or a State agency, and the rental shall be at least as much as will be required to keep the equipment in repair.

Mr. BEE. Is it the gentleman's construction that the language "State agency or municipal corporation" would include a county?

Mr. KAHN. I think it will; yes.

Mr. BEE. I wondered whether there would not be an uncertainty in the use of the language "any State agency or municipal corporation," because the great bulk of these trucks will be used by counties, and I do not know that a county is a State agency. In a great many States in this Union the county is an independent subdivision, like a municipal corporation.

Mr. KAHN. I assume that the counties would be taken care of under this language, because, as I am informed, the language was drawn by the gentleman in the Department of Agriculture who has charge of the good roads division.

Mr. BEE. Then there is no doubt in the gentleman's mind that the State agency would include a county?

Mr. KAHN. Quite so.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Did the committee consider the question whether the State in using this equipment might rent it to a corporation with which the State had a contract for the doing of work?

Mr. KAHN. Under the language used it can not lend the material to such a corporation. It can only lend it to a municipal corporation or State agency.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Could they make a contract with a contractor for doing road work and include in the price to be paid by the State the use of this equipment?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think they could make a contract with a private contractor for the use of such equipment.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. WOOD of Indiana, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, H. R. 12610, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last evening I was on my feet to offer an amendment, on page 128, line 25, to strike out the figures "$50,000" and insert the figures "$100,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SISSON: Page 128, line 25, strike out the figures "$50,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$100,000."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this item in the current law is $100,000. They asked for $150,000. I am simply endeavoring to restore the $100,000 carried by the current law, so that the work in the Far East may not be reduced. In my judgment the trade in the Far East, including the Pacific Ocean, means a great deal to the manufacturing interests of America. When we were discussing the question of the commercial attachés I did not take any time, because the demand for time was so great that I yielded all of my time to others, but I desire to say now, as has been repeatedly said during this debate, that this is not the time for America to take any backward step in securing foreign trade. After the close of the war England came to this country for the purpose of ascertaining exactly the organization which we have here under the Department of Commerce, and she became so thoroughly satisfied of the efficiency of that organization that she carried back the information to what they call the board of trade, the president of which is a member of the cabinet, and they adopted the system which America had adopted. In fact, this service was so efficient that England at once saw the benefits of the service to her people and adopted it. The South sends abroad about two-thirds of her raw cotton, and our southern cotton mills are largely dependent upon our foreign trade for the sale of their product. So if we want the full benefit of the cotton we produce, we should find a market for all our manufactured products and sell the finished product and not the raw cotton. England desires to sell all these people the product of her cotton mills, and yet she must depend upon us for raw cotton. So if England finds our system so perfect, why should we now abandon it, when this, of all times, is the time to press it? The world's trade is being reconstructed, and we should not neglect to get our full share.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Was that an official inquiry by the British Government?

Mr. SISSON. It was an official inquiry by the British Government. My information is that the British Empire is spending more than twice as much for this service as we are expending. That was her initial appropriation in carrying out the system which had been devised under our Department of Commerce.

In my judgment there is nothing that stands so much for the peace of the world as for people to trade with one another. I would rather have America known by the kind and character of goods that she manufactures and by the efficiency of her manufacturing enterprises than to have her known by the power and force of her armies. I would rather we would carry our flag into all the ports of the world at the mastheads of merchant vessels than to carry it on great naval vessels and powerful armaments. I would rather have a great commercial victory throughout the world, based upon agriculture and manufacturing, so that all the raw material in America may be converted into manufactured products, furnishing labor to American workingmen and sending its finished products throughout the world, than to attain the greatest military victory. In order that we may have prosperous manufacturing and prosperous agriculture it is necessary that we should have a permanent market and widening market. These commercial agents that go abroad are carrying peace and good will in one hand and the establishment of good business relations in the other, and in broadening our trade relations we extend the influences for peace throughout the world. If we are to have rest instead of unrest, contentment instead of discontent, if we are to have happy homes and a prosperous America, we must do it by finding markets for the products of American labor in the factory and on the farm. France and England are now reaching out to get the trade of the world, realizing the importance at this time of securing markets, for once gotten they will be hard to dislocate. I want this country not only to manufacture the goods, but to find markets throughout the world in which to sell these goods and have the ships in which to carry them. I want America to be great in peace and fulfill her destiny by furnishing clothing and food to the world, thereby making happier and better the peoples of the earth and in return making our own people the most prosperous and happy people of the world.

In other words, the whole aim and service of good government, in establishing proper international relations, is to build up trade and friendship with all peoples and to let the nations of the world trade with each other, to their mutual advantage and to the uplift of the whole human race.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask, Mr. Chairman, for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi.

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. I hope that ere long the American flag will be in every port of the world, and American goods will be there sold on their merits in greater quantities than those of any other nation in the world. In order to do this, I think it is wise economy to let the world know what we possess and find out what the world needs that we have to sell.

To accomplish this you must have men of skill and ability, men who are trained along commercial and not diplomatic lines, who can find out and tell you the financial troubles in every country, and how to establish banking facilities and facilities of exchange so that our commodities may be sold at least on equal terms with any other nation of the world. This is what we purpose to do here. The commercial agents become ministers of peace, because when people trade with you their interest and yours become interlocked. It brings the people of these two nations closer to each other, and the more business they do the less liability there will be that they will ever engage in warfare.

I believe that we should continue this service that has proved so efficient; and if we do we will not only be able to get vastly more business, but the good will in which we are held by the people of the other nations will greatly increase. I would rather send to the nations of the world our traveling salesmen than our armies and navies, because they are bearers of peace, the bearers of prosperity. I repeat, I would rather send them to the nations of the world than to send battleships and mighty guns. They are less expensive. Nobody raises any objection to the vast amount—the huge sums—that we spend for the Navy, but there comes a cry for economy when we offer to spend a small sum for the development of business along peaceful lines. Then comes the cry of extravagance. I do not believe it is extravagant; I believe it is economy.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTED. When the American manufacturers are being urged on every hand to increase production in order to reduce the high cost of living, is it not inconsistent to cripple the service which finds a market for those goods?

Mr. SISSON. I think the gentleman from New York is right. I think it is unfortunate at this particular time, when we are reconstructing along business lines throughout the world, for America not to be there on equal terms. I rather think we should get there a little before the other fellow and get the advantage.

Mr. WASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. WASON. Did I understand the gentleman from Mississippi to say that while we were urging American manufacturers to increase their products in order to reduce the high cost of living——

Mr. SISSON. That was the remark of the gentleman from New York, to which I agreed.

Mr. WASON. Does the gentleman advocate an extension of our foreign trade—our business with foreign countries—as a method of reducing the high cost of living?

Mr. SISSON. I feel that the prosperity of the country would be absolutely destroyed if you take from American labor its markets. I think the way to increase the wealth of the country, the wealth of the people, is to increase its commerce, and you can not increase the commerce unless you increase the field of the markets.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will gladly yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WINSLOW. Has the gentleman in the course of his inquiries into this matter come to realize the fact that it takes about two years for the wheels to turn over, and if we are ever to get back to normal times we must begin to prepare the ground to raise the crop several years ahead?

Mr. SISSON. I am glad that the gentleman from Massachusetts has made that statement, because he is a business man and knows what he is talking about. In other words, if we expect to secure the foreign trade of the world, we will not only have to have things to sell but we must have people to buy them. If England finds that it is so important that she should adopt our system, why should we turn back at this time. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I advocate this appropriation. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to enter into any academic discussion as to whether it is wise or unwise to push our foreign trade at this time. I conceive that a great deal could be said on either side. We are certainly not doing any good for our own people in pushing it at this time. The gentleman from New York recited the fact that we are being asked to produce more all the while, but if the production that we are making is going out of this country in such large quantities as it seems to go out and not enough of it being used for the purpose of satisfying our own people, and consequently the high cost of living is going up all the while, I expect that the consensus of the people of the United States would be that we had better check up a little on foreign exportations. [Applause.]

I desire to call the attention of the committee to this particular item and show you how needless it is to increase it at this particular time. The appropriation for 1919 under this item was $50,000. In 1920 it was $100,000. We appropriate, or the committee recommends in this bill, $50,000 on the assumption that if we could get along with $50,000 in 1919 we can get along with $50,000 this next year, and that during this unsettled condition we can at least hold our own until a more settled basis of trade relations is established which will warrant our increased activities.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to what this money is expended for. They have in Japan trade commissioners, two at Tokyo, and at Peking there are six trade commissioners—six at one place. It seems to me that we could get along with less than six commissioners at Peking. The total salaries for those trade commissioners and the investigators in the Far East aggregate $50,000. I imagine that there would be plenty of United States representation so far as our trade relations are concerned if there were half the number of trade commissioners at Peking; $50,000 would cover the expense and more that they had there in 1919 and pay all of the other incidental expenses, so that if we are honestly endeavoring as representatives of the people to save some money where it can be advantageously saved without any detriment to any activity, this surely is one of those items. There is no more reason for an appropriation of $100,000 in this item this year than there was in 1919. I believe we should have some consideration with respect to consistency in these appropriations, that they should have some correlation to each other. Here is another beautiful example of what is going on in every one of these bureaus. In 1919, $50,000; in 1920, $100,000; and in 1921 they are estimating for $150,000; and, mark my words, they will be here next year asking for $300,000 for this item. That has been the ratio of increase in every one of the items of this department. There is no limit to it if we will but yield each increasing request coming from this department.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the strictest economy in the Government service and a return to normal conditions. I believe we would much better expend $100,000 on commercial agents in the Orient than a half billion dollars for an Army at home and another half billion dollars or more for a Navy. [Applause.] A Navy to protect our commerce! In my judgment it is better to spend a little money to get the commerce than an immense amount of money to protect it before we have gotten it.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] says that there are six of these agents at Peking. Very well. Peking is the capital of the Chinese Empire, with 400,000,000 inhabitants, at least, and how many more no one knows. The men are not all stationed at Peking. They do not all live at Peking. That is the headquarters. If I had my way about it, I would have a commercial salesman in every locality of China, teaching and showing the Chinese how to use the things which we can make and sell to them at high prices, and which they need now but do not know it. A live American salesman, if he understood the Chinese language, could be of great value there. They have sent their boys and men over here by the hundreds to learn American civilization. We have not had sense enough to really try to learn the Chinese civilization or to teach them to profit by what we can sell to them. I do not think the fact that the cost of living here is high is any reason why we should not continue to extend our commerce abroad. If the high cost of living is to continue, the high prices that we will get for our products will remunerate us. We hope that the high cost of living will not continue; that we will be able to produce more than we need; but if we have reached the point where the great American people, with all of their ingenuity and machinery, are unable to produce more than they need for home consumption then we are on a rapid decline toward general degeneration. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes, to some extent out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes, slightly out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Upon what subject?

Mr. MADDEN. It is on this bill, but it may not be directly upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. It is not on the League of Nations?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I concur largely in what my colleague has said. If there is any place where we can afford to invest money for commercial agencies, I think it is in the Orient, because there the balance of trade is against the United States and we are compelled every day to send gold to pay out adverse balances. On the other hand, the balance of trade is largely in our favor toward Europe and we are not receiving any gold in payment for the balances which are in our favor. Therefore, I think we can well afford to undertake the development of trade in Central and South America, in China, and Japan.

What I want particularly to call the attention of the committee to this morning is this: I have been receiving a good many letters to the effect that the writers have been given to understand that I personally am opposed to a 10 per cent increase in the pay of the Army and the Army officers. I wish to call attention to the question in this public way by saying that I know of no such proposition pending before the Congress. I do know of proposals to increase the pay of the Army officers all the way from 31 per cent to 50 per cent, and I am opposed to that. This is not a time for extravagant expenditures, for increased compensation to those who are in the public service. The time has come to begin to realize that the taxpayer in the country should have some consideration. We find ourselves faced with a propaganda advocating increased compensation to the Army officers, the amount of which will be $80,000,000 a year.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to yield just now. Later on I may. Before we went into the war we had less than a billion dollars bonded debt. The cost of maintaining the Government annually was not much over a billion dollars. The annual interest charge amounted to $22,000,000. We came out of the war with a bonded debt of $26,000,000,000, with an annual interest charge of $1,017,000,000. We came out of the war also with a deficit, which is existing to-day, of $3,050,000,000. The estimated expenses for the fiscal year ending 1921, as submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, amount to $4,865,000,000. They have underestimated about a billion dollars. As a matter of fact, therefore, we are facing obligations for 1921 of $9,000,000,000. The estimated receipts for 1921 are $6,000,000,000. It is said on good authority that $700,000,000 of this will not go into the Treasury, so that we find ourselves with $5,300,000,000 of receipts with which to pay $9,000,000,000.

The people all over the United States are demanding a reduction in taxation, and everybody on the pay roll is demanding an increase in compensation. And how you can reconcile the two propositions I do not know. From the day the Declaration of Independence was declared until the day the war was declared it cost the people of the United States twenty-five and a half billion dollars to run this Government, and during the war it cost them $51,500,000,000. The bonds of the United States have fallen to 89, and may fall still further. We have this balance of trade in our favor toward Europe, and we are receiving nothing in compensation for the goods we sell but acceptances from those to whom we sell the goods. We have, I am credibly told, more than $12,000,000,000 of those acceptances in American banks discounted, many of them not being paid when they fall due.

The European countries owe us $10,000,000,000, on which they are not paying the interest. We find ourselves in a situation where we must, if we are loyal to our own country, curtail expenses. In addition to the figures I have given, we have proposals for a large expenditure for Civil War veterans' pensions and additional proposals for large expenditures for Spanish-American War veterans' pensions. We have proposals now before the Committee on Ways and Means to legislate for the men who were in the World War, and these proposals range all the way from $2,000,000,000 to $20,000,000,000. If we by any chance are called upon to issue bonds for two or more billion dollars, we will have to put them on a 6 per cent basis, and I doubt even then if we will be able to sell them to the American people.

Mr. GARNER. If we had to issue $2,000,000,000 on a 6 per cent basis, what will the bonds now outstanding be worth on the market?

Mr. MADDEN. In that case, I predict not above 75 cents on the dollar, and I would not be much surprised if they would sell lower than that.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that every single bond issue that the American people have put on the market yet has been oversubscribed almost double? And I think it is an aspersion upon the patriotism of the American people to intimate that their bonds will go without buyers.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not true that each bond issue found subscribers for more than double the amount of the issue. But the bonds are down to 89 cents to-day. No one will deny that.

Mr. BLANTON. But they will be bought to-morrow if an issue is put on the market.

Mr. MADDEN. The bonds sold during the war were sold because of the patriotic fervor of the American people, because they wanted to win the war, and they were willing to make any sacrifice to that end.

Mr. OLNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Not just now. We had approximately 2,000,000 people organized for the purpose of soliciting the sale of bonds, and we succeeded in inducing 20,000,000 of the American people to buy them. Before the war there were only 300,000 bondholders in the United States, and I venture to say without fear of successful contradiction that not more than a million of the American people are able to buy bonds and hold them. And what is the result? The result is the other 19,000,000 people as fast as they can are disposing of their bonds, and that is why they are falling. They did not buy them with any money they had; they bought them on the credit the banks extended, and with a patriotic fervor which induced them to do everything, to make every sacrifice that was within their power to win the war. But we are not in war any longer. We are in a position where we must rehabilitate, rehabilitate and maintain the equilibrium and preserve the financial integrity of the Nation. We must reduce expenses. We had 450,000 people on the civil pay rolls of the United States before the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will in a minute. During the war we had 2,000,000 people on the civil pay roll of the Government. To-day we have 350,000 people more than we have use for, and yet we can not pry them loose from the pay roll. Those who are on the pay roll are demanding increased compensation. Those who are on the tax roll are demanding reduced taxation. Who are you going to favor? Shall we favor those who pay the bills or those who consume the taxes? Shall we try to preserve the financial equilibrium of the United States or shall we bankrupt the Treasury? That is the question which we are facing. [Applause.] If Europe fails to meet the obligations which our banks are carrying and we are no longer in a position to float American issues and get the people of the United States to buy them, what is to become of America's integrity? Is it not infinitely more important that these people who are demanding increased compensation should aid in preserving the integrity of the country and its finances? [Applause.] They will suffer less by undergoing the hardships they are now undergoing with the present compensation than they will suffer if bankruptcy faces the Nation. That is when real sacrifices will be necessary and patriotism more in demand than ever before. Now I will yield.

Mr. OLNEY. May I remind the gentleman from Illinois that the largest increase in pay for officers in the Army and Navy is provided for in the so-called Wadsworth-Crago bill, which increases it on the basis of 10 per cent on base pay and a ration increase, which all together is a promotion in pay of about 31 per cent? These officers are resigning every day literally because they can not live on the present salaries.

Mr. MADDEN. I realize that, but men in all other lines are changing their field of activities from time to time, but others come forward to take their places.

Mr. OLNEY. The gentleman realizes that, and as a consistent, firm friend of the Federal employees of the Post Office Department he can not fail to support the additional pay for the Army and the Navy.

Mr. MADDEN. The men in the military service are wonderful, and no one has more admiration for them than I have. But we have educated many of these men at Government expense, every one of the West Point men at a cost of $20,000 each. They owe the country some cooperation in the present emergency. They are paid three-fourths of their active pay when they retire.

There are millions of men throughout the Nation who are not on the Government pay roll. They are in no position to demand increased compensation at the expense of the tax-paying public. They receive no retired pay when they are no longer able to function. The time has come when they, as all others, must join in a unified movement to put the Nation on a financial basis that will enable this country to weather any storm that may come as the result of failure abroad. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, this is not a pleasant speech to make, but it is one of the speeches that ought to be made, because we are having propaganda in every mail urging and demanding to know why it is that we are so unpatriotic as to refuse increased compensation to those who are already well compensated. For one, I want to serve notice to those who are writing me that I am for the Public Treasury. I am for the Nation. If there is any man on the pay roll who can not join in a movement to preserve the honor of the Nation and its financial integrity, let him leave the Government service. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, we need something more than increased appropriations to aid the United States in its campaign for foreign trade. Before we can compete with other nations and secure our fair portion, legislation must be enacted. We need a law to permit the United States Government to authorize the incorporation of certain companies to engage in foreign trade. I desire to speak specially with reference to China, a country in which there is vast opportunity for American trade, due, in part, to the fact that China is very friendly to the United States and wants to do business with us. Great Britain, however, and other countries have an advantage, in that we of the United States do not authorize the chartering of companies to do foreign trade. There is pending in the Committee on the Judiciary a bill that I introduced some time ago. It is known as H. R. 7204, and has for its purpose the placing of the United States upon an equal footing with Great Britain. We ought to secure immediate action upon this bill, as the conditions in China at this time demand the earliest possible relief. To give some idea of this situation I beg to call attention to a letter recently written to Representatives BRITTEN and EDMONDS by Mr. F. W. Sutterle, of the American Chinese Co. at Shanghai. This letter is as follows:

MY DEAR EDMONDS AND BRITTEN: I am writing you jointly for fear one or the other may be away, believing it will be of interest to you both, and is something that if any action can or is to be taken will receive your joint support. Until quite recently the only means of incorporating and working companies in the East, especially in China, were "the Hongkong ordinances," enacted by the British Government. Under these facilities a great many companies known as British companies representing capitalization of several hundred millions have come into existence; it is a well recognized fact that the greater part of this capital comes from the Chinese, but the prestige goes to the credit of British commerce. In a number of the enterprises in which we are interested, two of which we own entire (American capital), we went like others as a matter of convenience and organized under the British ordinances in Hongkong. During the war an order was issued that the majority of the directors in these companies should be British, which was very easily complied with, as there was no difficulty in obtaining Britishers as directors in return for the fees who would be willing to cooperate with the management, especially in a sound business way, where everything was conducted properly, but they have now issued an order that in British companies the managing director or anyone having control or management must be British.

Without going into the question as to whether this is right or wrong—the procedure is certainly wrong, has damaged British interests and makes the opening for American, which is the object in writing to you—this order provides that the changes must be made within 60 days and it ought to be recognized that it is a physical impossibility to go out and find a man to whom you can turn over the management of your business and feel safe in 60 days. China in the near future is going to make very rapid progress and companies will be required to operate all kinds of business; the Chinese are very anxious to cooperate with foreigners, having millions to invest and anxious to join with foreigners in whom they have confidence as to their manner in doing business and their experience, but it is to be recognized now that if the British Government can and has taken such a drastic action there will be few if any that will avail themselves of the Hongkong ordinances if there are any other ways and means of incorporating, and no matter where and from whom the capital comes, the business credit and prestige will go to the nationality under whom the charter has been obtained. I understand that Congressman DYER interested himself and I have been told that a bill has been prepared if it is not already before Congress. Charles Denby, Esq. (formerly U. S. consul, Shanghai), when out here consulted with some Americans and took back with him some data which was the basis of the bill and I am also informed that this bill contains the proviso that American companies formed under this act, operating in China, will be subject to the income taxes and capital must be 51 per cent American. Now, if this is the case such an act would be entirely useless or valueless; it must be recognized as stated that the bulk of the capital must be found locally and will come from Chinese; they will not go for British charters under this new order in council, but they certainly would not go for an American charter if the American company would be handicapped by heavier charges compared with the British, and as of the lesser of the two evils they would take the British. The British Government exempts these companies formed under British law and operating in the East and the object is to obtain for British prestige the commercial advantage of having these companies British in the eyes of the Chinese. Under this precedent if Americans, officials and business men, want to keep pace with the British we must have the same advantages. Give to the American court in China the authority to grant charters to companies formed to do business in the East, particularly in China and exempt from taxes collected at home and capital subscribed without restrictions. As a business man of many years experience here in the East I recognize that this is one of the opportunities for the American Government and business men to greatly increase their prestige and standing with the Chinese and I recommend this to your serious consideration.

With kinds regards to you both, I remain,

Yours, sincerely, F. W. SUTTERLE.

The Committee on the Judiciary recently had some hearings upon this bill, the last ones are of date January 27, 1920, and I would be glad if the membership of this House would read the bill that I have introduced and the hearings referred to, so that they may plainly see the great need of immediate action. I wish to call attention here to a portion of the testimony of two of the witnesses who appeared before the committee. One was Mr. Charles Denby, who has had wide experience in China. He said in part:

Mr. DENBY. I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, that the issue has become very much more urgent than it was when I was here before. We American business men have been under the British law which has been very liberal, indeed. The Hongkong Government has now made some restrictions regarding its corporations that are going to practically deprive the Americans of the control of their business in China, and it is up to you gentlemen to take care of us. That is all there is to it.

There are two things we want in this law. We want tax-free corporations and we want companies in which we can have a majority of non-American capital. If we can not get those two things, there is no good of you enacting this law, because we can go to any one of 48 States now and get everything else; we can go to any one of 48 States and get a charter to form a company in which the majority of the capital is owned in central Africa, if we want to. But a State corporation is not what we want for doing business abroad; they are not made for business abroad and they are not adapted for doing business abroad. As a matter of fact, an individual goes out as a citizen of the United States and not as a citizen of Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, etc. Also American corporations abroad are not dependent upon our States in any respect. The States do not follow them to supervise them or regulate them and the States do not protect them. American corporations abroad, in China that I am speaking of, are under the protection of the American Government; they report to the United States Government; they appeal to the United States Government for assistance. They are not protected by the States, and there is no more reason why they should go abroad as corporations of a State than an individual should go abroad as a citizen of the State.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Denby, take those two points you refer to as being the most important. Suppose you make it plain to the membership of the committee why they must be permitted to have a majority of the stock controlled by foreigners and, second, why corporations should be tax free. Those are two things that ought to be brought out.

Mr. DENBY. American corporations abroad should be free from American corporate taxes, because we raise our capital abroad, in China particularly, from an international community; English, French, Chinese, Japanese, etc. The amount of American money is not great in volume. The Chinese money is great. The Chinese are perfectly willing to put their money into a company organized under an American charter. They have done it in a great number of cases.

If you Representatives in Congress are going to build up American trade you should be broadminded, and you should give American commerce the same opportunity that Great Britain has given her commerce for 40 years.

Mr. DYER. Now, does Great Britain provide that a majority of the stock of a corporation can be controlled by the Chinese; and how about taxation?

Mr. DENBY. Great Britain absolutely allows the capital to be raised without restriction. There are no restrictions whatever by Great Britain as to that. I have myself formed four public-utilities corporations under the laws of Great Britain which are now in operation. They are not financed necessarily by British capital. In every one of them the majority of the stock is owned by Chinese capital. In the Tientsin City Waterworks Co., for example, they have more than $1,300,000 capital fully paid, and 80 per cent of that is Chinese capital. Two of the directors are Chinese. As a matter of fact, the directors of a lot of those British companies up to the time of the war were Chinese until Great Britain began to tighten control over their corporations' activities. Great Britain has had a great deal of commercial sense, for when you start a British company with Chinese money you will enlist that Chinese money in British trade. It is evident if you start an English waterworks company in China with Chinese money that that company is going to regard with favor English machinery for the plant.

I also want to call attention in part to the testimony of Mr. Paul S. Reinsch, who served as United minister to China from 1913 to 1919. His testimony in part was as follows:

Mr. REINSCH. I certainly believe very strongly in the need of such legislation, and have in my reports to the Department of State strongly recommended legislation of this kind.

The reasons have been quite fully stated by Mr. Denby in his remarks. I look upon the measure as necessary to give us our proper share in the development of the commerce and the natural resources in China. Now, this bill provides for the formation of corporations to engage in lawful enterprises in foreign countries or noncontiguous territories of the United States of America, or in localities in which the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction, but I shall refer more particularly to China. There are a great many enterprises that Chinese would undertake in connection with corporations of Americans, such as, for instance, local power plants and waterworks, irrigation and drainage enterprises, mining and also manufacturing. There are already established in China factories for the manufacturing of electrical materials, which are managed by Americans, controlled by American capital. With regard to commercial corporations, the discussions that have been going on here have brought out quite clearly the point that a manufacturing concern might organize a trading subsidiary; but I would query how could the profits of the subsidiary be transferred to the main corporation without becoming taxable.

Sir, the situation could not be more favorable. In the first place we enjoy the good will of the Chinese and their confidence in a very high measure. They really feel this friendliness. It is not merely for State occasions. It exists broadly among the people. Therefore that makes it very easy for our merchants to establish good and mutually helpful relations with the Chinese. In the second place, China is just on the threshold of a great development of her resources. The Chinese are ready for it. They have capital to put into it. They are, however, still weak on the side of organization, and that is where our people can help by furnishing experience in modern business organization. By investing some capital they may thereby associate with their capital a large amount of Chinese money and carry through the whole enterprise according to modern business methods.

Mr. WALSH. What competition is there in China? You have spoken of these British corporations. Do the other Governments give the same privileges?

Mr. REINSCH. Before the war the Germans gave the same liberal taxation arrangements to their own corporations, although it was perhaps inherently impossible for the Germans to be administratively as liberal as the British, so that a great deal of German capital organized under the Hongkong laws. The British work in every way to protect the interests of corporations doing business abroad. In China they are in every way favored more by their own Government than are our representatives. The Japanese enterprises are also specially favored by their Government in many ways.

Another witness who appeared before the committee on the date mentioned was Mr. Francis P. Eldridge, Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Department of Commerce. He presented a letter from Mr. Julian Arnold, American commercial attaché at Shanghai, addressed to Mr. J. Harold Dollar, president of the American Chamber of Commerce of Shanghai, which I think of interest and which I insert. It is as follows:

SHANGHAI, September 13, 1918.

Mr. J. HAROLD DOLLAR,
President American Chamber of Commerce of China, Shanghai.

SIR: At the general meeting of the chamber of commerce on Tuesday, the 10th instant, the question of the proposed act for the incorporation of companies for carrying on foreign business exclusively was touched upon by Mr. Sprague in response to a criticism made by me to the effect that the proposed act as now drawn up failed to provide that at least 51 per cent of the capital stock of such corporation shall be held by American citizens.

I mentioned this matter to both Mr. Denby and Maj. Holcomb, who were members of the committee which reported on this proposed act. Mr. Denby appeared to be adverse to the idea of including such a proviso, as he contended that the act should encourage in as large a way as possible the incorporation of companies in China under the American flag.

Although Mr. Sprague stated at the meeting of the chamber of commerce that the omission of this proviso was an oversight on the part of the committee and that before the final draft it will be included, yet I feel that I should like to place on record with the chamber my reasons for suggesting the necessity of the inclusion of stipulation providing that at least 51 per cent of the capital stock must be held by bona fide American citizens. As the chamber is undoubtedly aware, there are many Chinese who would be glad to avail themselves of an opportunity to secure American incorporation for interests which they represent in China, as they could thereby evade the jurisdiction of their own laws for the payment of certain taxes which might be imposed upon a Chinese company and secure American protection in the event of disturbances, riots, or rebellions. Many Chinese would welcome an opportunity of displaying a signboard in front of their establishments, especially in the interior treaty ports, claiming American incorporation for their firms, and consequently American protection. Our consuls would find themselves called upon to secure for these firms protection to which they rightfully should not be entitled.

Furthermore, certain Japanese individuals would undoubtedly welcome opportunities to secure American incorporation for activities in China, as they realize that the American good name carries with it a valuable good will. Here, again, we find ourselves confronted with embarrassment in connection with the use of our flag, our name, and our protection.

It is surprising to know that this very important question seems to have escaped the attention of the committee, as in my estimation it is the most important detail in connection with the drafting of the act, so far as the protection of our interests in China are concerned, and the prevention of the abuse of the American good name and the flag.

I do not see that legitimate American interests will in any way suffer by the inclusion of such a proviso as I propose in this act; in fact, would benefit thereby, as they will be protected, so far as legitimate enactment can protect them, against "shady interests" using the proposed enactment to further their wily schemes. The fact that the proposed act carries with it a provision requiring a majority of American citizens on the board of directors will not be ample protection, as it is not difficult to secure dummy directors and defeat any virtues which this requirement by itself might possess.

I shall appreciate a statement from the chamber as to the nature of the proviso which it intends to include in the proposed act to cover the point which I raised. I wish also to be informed as to whether or not the special committee has already forwarded to Washington any recommendation in connection with the passage of this act.

Very truly, yours,

JULIAN ARNOLD,
American Commercial Attaché.

Mr. Eldridge also presented a cablegram, which I insert:

SHANGHAI, January 1.

UNITED STATES CHAMBER COMMERCE,
Washington:

British Government enacts legislation eliminating American executives from staff of companies organized in China under Hongkong ordinance. Local American companies use British Hongkong incorporation law owing to lack of national American incorporation law for China. British act detrimental.

American interests in Orient affecting shipping, manufacturing, insurance, lumber, real estate, hotel companies. Urge State Department and Senate Foreign Relations Committee intercede British Government; also urge immediate enactment Federal incorporation law to preserve American interests in China.

AM. CHAM. COM.

He also presented an item appearing in the Financial News of January 3, 1920, which is as follows:

CHINA COMPANIES—AMERICANS AND THE ORDER THAT MANAGERS MUST BE BRITISH.

SHANGHAI, December 29 (delayed).

The publication of the order in council which was gazetted on October 10 providing that managing directors of "China companies" must be of British nationality has created a very delicate situation, as a number of most important British companies are at present managed by Americans, who under the provisions of the order must vacate their positions at 60 days' notice.

The American Chamber of Commerce and the American Association of China have written to the British Chamber of Commerce and the British China Association pointing out that Anglo-American relations in the Far East will be imperiled if the order is enforced.

It is understood that the British Chamber and the China Association replied stating that the Americans had failed to appreciate the British standpoint, which was that British companies must be British managed; otherwise one law would be applicable to a company and another to its manager. The chamber and association added that they did not believe that Anglo-American relations could be imperiled by reasonable British action.

The feeling of Americans against the British procedure is running high, and it is stated that a protest to the United States State Department has been drafted but not yet dispatched. (Reuter.)

The text of the order in council reads:

"(1) No person, other than a British subject resident within the limits of this order, shall act as managing director or in any position similar to that of managing director, or shall otherwise exercise general or substantial control of the business of a China company.

"(2) If default is made in compliance with this article the company shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $50 for every day during which the default continues, and every director and every manager of the company who knowingly authorizes or permits the default shall be liable to the like penalty.

"(3) Failure to comply with the provisions of this article shall be a ground upon which an order for winding up the company may be made by the court.

"(4) This article shall come into force 60 days after the publication of this order."

There was inserted in the hearings upon this bill at this time a statement made by Hon. J. W. Alexander, Secretary of Commerce, and which is as follows:

This bill is identical with S. 5194 and H. R. 15499, which were introduced into the Senate and House of the Sixty-fifth Congress. These bills were drawn up by the American Chamber of Commerce at Shanghai in response to a need for an incorporation law for American companies doing business exclusively in foreign countries and those countries in which the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction, namely, China, Siam, and Turkey. The importance of some legislation which will place American companies in such countries on an equality with British and other companies is readily apparent. The statement of Secretary of Commerce Redfield before the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate on January 31, 1919, summarizes in a way, which will bear repetition, the present situation:

"At present no company formed by Americans and with American capital trading exclusively abroad can be incorporated except under the laws of one of our 48 States. These laws are unlike one another; they are constantly changing; they differ very considerably in powers, in restrictions, in opportunities; but perhaps one of the chiefest difficulties in foreign markets—and it should be borne in mind that I am speaking now exclusively of foreign markets and of companies which trade only in them and which do not do business in the United States—is that the individual States are not known and understood as distinct from, separate from, the Government of the United States itself.

"In the Far East, for example, a company organized under the laws of any specific State has always a question concerning its origin. The State is not known or, if it is known, not understood. The foreign merchant may not always know why instead of a charter being given from the National Government it is given from a State, which forms but a portion of that Government. He is accustomed in his foreign transactions to dealing with nations and not with subdivisions of nations. He would, in many instances, wonder whether a charter from one of our States was not akin in character to a charter from a subdivision of France or from a subdivision of Great Britain or a subdivision of some other country. The independent sovereignty of our States within their own concerns is something that he often does not comprehend. He realizes very well that the company having this State charter has not the official parentage of the National Government. It leads to doubt.

"To meet this proposition Great Britain has, for instance, in her colony of Hongkong, which is widely known, granted charters of that colony; and American concerns desiring to incorporate have, as a matter of fact, because of that fact, because the Hongkong charter was understood and its laws were clear, incorporated their companies under the Hongkong laws. In that respect American citizens have thus become, in their corporate relations, subjects of the British Empire, subject certainly to its laws and its regulations, because it was on the whole more advantageous to them to thus, in a measure, expatriate themselves in their corporate relations than it was to attempt to make plain to people who did not understand the peculiar construction of our Government why one of the separate entities which form our Republic acts in the matter instead of the Republic itself.

"It is a matter of prestige very largely. It is a matter of doing away with the necessity of making explanations. It is a matter of establishing credit on a broad scale; or, perhaps, it may be summed up in this respect, that it is a matter of establishing confidence.

"In the foreign trade nothing is more important than confidence. On it all transactions are based; and perhaps the greatest single step of the kind that would be possible for us to take now would be thus to throw the mantle of Federal authority and the prestige of the Federal name over corporate activities who function wholly abroad and who come into conflict in no way with any State laws by any of their operations, and who would thus get the benefit of the national power and the national prestige, for it alone is fully comprehended and understood.

"I think I ought to say also that this in no way involves the question, to my mind, of the Federal law for domestic corporations. This is a foreign matter and has no relation that I can see to domestic matters. I think that the two should not be now confused, and to bring up this as forming an entering wedge for domestic corporations is a mistake. It has no relation, as I can see, to that matter of domestic Federal charters. Conditions are different. Here we are functioning in a field where it has been shown by experience that the local or the State charter can not and does not meet the situation. Men will go elsewhere, our loyal citizens will incorporate under foreign laws, because, in substance, the situation requires them to do so. And the acts performed under these foreign charters by Americans thus incorporated are acts which have no relation to the territorial jurisdiction or the domestic commerce of the United States, except so far as every foreign transaction, in its final reaction, comes back through other sources to this country, as they of course all do. But the operations of these companies are carried on wholly abroad, and they can not, as experience shows, be carried on now successfully under charters which, to the foreign mind, may be under a limitation of that kind, and, it is a fact, are local charters.

"The foreign merchant seeking to invest, as Chinese willingly do, in foreign companies, would look in vain in his country for the representative of a State from whom he could ascertain facts, from whom he could learn the scope of their laws and their nature; but he does know the United States of America, and it has representatives there. So, in like manner, he knows the independent, self-governing colony of Hongkong, and he can determine what its laws are. I think we might get, perhaps, a view at this situation if we remove it for the moment from our own country and look at it as if we were orientals ourselves, willing to invest in a company operating in our country under a charter which was, say, from some South American Republic. I think we should all understand what a charter from Argentina or from Brazil meant. We should be able to go to the embassies or the legations of those countries and determine what their corporate laws were. We would recognize them as responsible authoritative powers. But I question if we would know the names of the States which compose those Federal Republics; and I think if we were offered a charter from one of the States composing the Republic of Brazil we would say, 'Why not from Brazil itself? Why should we deal with an individual State?' The laws of that State are not the same as the laws of Brazil; they are not the same as the laws of other States that form Brazil. We are ready to put our money into a scheme to operate in our own country if it has an ascertained law behind it, but we can not do so if it has one of what seems a subordinate, even though a self-governing, portion of a republic concerning which we have not readily available means of information, and concerning which we can not, through authoritative sources, directly inquire.

"That is, to my mind, a thing which is hampering the development of American commerce, particularly in the Far East—this necessary uncertainty. It goes without saying that this does not imply any reflection upon the character or credit of any State. On the contrary, it is because the State is sovereign in its domestic affairs and may and does constantly develop its corporate laws that the changes occur which make it utterly impossible for you and me, let us say as Chinese merchants having money to invest in a corporation which is to function in our own country, to do so on a basis which is known to be constantly evolving; whereas a Federal charter, which would be understood to be the net result of the best experience, and concerning which its development would be ascertainable at any time, would be a much more clear matter."

Until very recently the need for early action on this bill was necessary in order to maintain American prestige and foster American-Chinese industrial undertakings. But on December 29, the publication of the following British Hongkong Government order in council rendered some immediate action necessary if many American companies were not to lose what prestige of American nationality they were able to retain as incorporations under the Hongkong ordinances.

The text of the order in council reads:

"(1) No person, other than a British subject resident within the limits of this order, shall act as managing director, or in any position similar to that of managing director, or shall otherwise exercise general or substantial control of the business of a China company.

"(2) If default is made in compliance with this article the company shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $50 for every day during which the default continues, and director and every manager of the company who knowingly authorizes or permits the default shall be liable to the like penalty.

"(3) Failure to comply with the provisions of this article shall be a ground upon which an order for winding up the company may be made by the court.

"(4) This article shall come into force 60 days after the publication of this order."

In view of this immediate urgency, it is hoped that Congress may enact legislation providing a suitable incorporation law under which American companies, now under Hongkong and State laws, may properly incorporate in China.

J. W. ALEXANDER,
Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. Chairman, I go to the length I do in presenting these matters because many Members of Congress are not familiar with the situation and the needs of legislation along the lines indicated. Some action must be had without delay unless we are to sacrifice our great opportunity for foreign trade with China. China is the greatest field open to-day to the American people. We will be neglectful if we do not act.

Let me add that the present American consul general at Shanghai, Mr. Edwin T. Cunningham, has recently called attention to the need of immediate legislation in this respect. In an official report to the Secretary of Commerce just received, Mr. Cunningham stated that the order in council issued recently by Great Britain eliminating American executives from companies organized under the Hongkong ordinance was "detrimental to American interests and affected shipping, manufacturing, insurance, lumber, real estate, and hotel companies." "In no other way than by the enactment of the Federal incorporation law," he said, "can American capital be placed on an equal footing with that of other nations, particularly the British."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this debate must close some time. Let us see if we can not agree on a time for closing.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment, and I might want 10 minutes, but 5 minutes will do on the bill and the amendment pending.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like five minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Of which I ask for seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the position apparently assumed by the two gentlemen who have spoken in defense of the committee action in cutting down the item for the promotion of commerce in the Far East below last year's appropriation is a strange one to me. The gentleman from New Hampshire and the gentleman from Indiana seem to contend that it would be a wise policy for this Government to draw in its activities and cease to try to export and import, in order that by confining our market to our shores we might have a surfeit of our home products and thereby reduce the price of our products to our own people. Of all the anomalous positions ever announced on the floor of Congress, I think that is the most remarkable, for, if we do draw in and live to ourselves commercially, I think we might live to ourselves socially, and we might die the death of the unworthy nation that would be so richly our desert. That a Republican committee should frame a bill on such a policy seems incredible. A wayfaring man, though a fool, could read our future should we adopt such a policy.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to be particular. The volume of our trade with the world, whatever the disposition of the gentleman may be, for last year was something like $15,000,000,000—some six or eight billions export and a less quantity of imports. In this whole measure for the Foreign and Domestic Commerce Bureau the department had appropriated last year about $1,000,000; they asked this year for $1,500,000. The committee cut them to less than $500,000. The amendments under this head offered by the gentleman from Mississippi will restore the appropriations of last year, aggregating about $1,000,000. Now, for the purpose of advancing and promoting a trade that involves $15,000,000,000 the department asked for $1,500,000. I congratulate the House that every one of the amendments offered by the gentleman from Mississippi so far has been adopted, and something like a million dollars has been appropriated, or inserted in the bill, instead of less than half a million. If we had asked for the full amount asked for by the department, I take it, from the temper of the House, that it would have been granted; but we only asked for last year's appropriations. It is too small. Now is the time when we should increase our efforts to build up our foreign trade. But the department will live under the bill as amended, and when saner councils prevail Congress will do its full duty in this matter. As I have said, our foreign trade was last year $15,000,000,000. We are proposing to spend in cultivating that trade $1,000,000, which is about one-fifteenth of one-tenth of 1 per cent of the trade we seek to foster.

But, Mr. Chairman, in order that the matter may be placed more concisely before the committee, I ask that the statement of the Secretary of Commerce be read in my time. It states the whole situation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the statement.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT AUTHORIZED BY THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE.

I do not believe the members of the subcommittee which decided to cut our appropriations for promoting foreign trade had any intention of crippling American commerce. The explanation of their action, I feel sure, is that they did not fully realize the part the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has come to play in promoting trade. Our manufacturers and exporters take this help from the department almost as a matter of course. It has never occurred to them that Members of Congress might not be as well informed on the subject as they are. Had the committee known the attitude of the business community it would have looked upon the matter in an entirely different light. Even the feeling that the work now carried on so efficiently by the commercial attachés could be taken over by the Consular Service of the State Department, would not have prevailed. I am sure the committee did not know that the business men, by means of a referendum by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, decided by an overwhelming majority that a commercial attaché service should be established in the Department of Commerce to carry on trade-promotion work that the Consular Service could not handle. The members of the committee, if fully informed, would undoubtedly defer to the judgment of the manufacturer and exporter in this matter, for the service is conducted solely for their benefit.

As it is, the cutting by nearly half of the existing appropriations for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce threatens a body blow at American export trade development. It will mean the dismantling of the most essential part of our foreign trade promotion machinery at the very moment when England, Japan, Germany, and France are leaving no stone unturned to increase the volume of their export business. Both England and France have just reorganized their foreign commercial service on a larger scale than ever before. Other countries are planning to do likewise. This is no time for the United States to throw into the discard the entire commercial attaché service, almost all of the trade commissioners abroad, and the existing district and cooperatives offices of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in 15 American cities. It has taken years to develop these services to the point of efficiency which they now possess. The expenditure of money necessary to build up and maintain the field work of the Department of Commerce abroad and at home has been amply justified, as I am confident thousands of American business firms, large and small, will gladly testify.

Consider what this drastic cut in appropriations will mean. Twelve commercial attachés—men trained and experienced in commercial and economic matters—who are at present attached to embassies and legations in a dozen important foreign capitals, where they are charged specifically and wholly with the promotion of American business interests at this critical period in the world's history, will be withdrawn peremptorily within three months' time. At least 15 trade commissioners who are reporting on rapidly changing commercial conditions in European countries from Denmark to Austria will have to be recalled by the 1st of May.

A deliberate sacrificing of the finest foreign-trade promotion machine any country has ever built up—one which half a dozen of our keenest competitors have sought to use as a model. The spending of several hundred thousand dollars a year on constructive export-trade promotion work, such as this bureau is accomplishing can not be considered as an outright expenditure in any sense of the word. It should be regarded as an investment, based on the same common-sense principles which govern every individual business firm in the United States. It is so regarded by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, by the National Foreign Trade Council, by the American Manufacturers' Export Association, and by hundreds of national and local associations of business men.

In the same way the threatened abolishment of the bureau's 15 district and cooperative offices in New York, Chicago, Boston, New Orleans, San Francisco, St. Louis, Seattle, Cleveland, Philadelphia, and six other cities will mean the elimination of a service which has demonstrated its usefulness in manifold ways. Each of these offices fills a genuine need in its particular district. Each office forms an important contact between the business public and the Washington headquarters of the bureau for the dissemination of information on foreign trade subjects. What will take their place?

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is not a bureau created by the war emergency. Its appropriations were not increased to take care of war activity, and its personnel was not added to for the sake of carrying on the war-time work which is now no longer necessary. The bureau has had a consistent growth over a period of eight years, and there is every bit as much justification for the Government to aid and encourage by expert technical advice the American firms engaged in foreign trade as there is for the Government through the Department of Agriculture to aid and encourage the farmers of the country. Foreign trade is essential to preserve the economic stability of the United States. Cutting by nearly half the existing appropriations of the bureau means simply that the clock has been put back by over four years. If the Department of Commerce, in effect as well as in name, is to be a department of commerce it should be possible to increase the essential work of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce rather than to have its activities lopped off to a point where it will be no longer possible to function properly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent to include the remainder of it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I think that the talk made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] was most timely. It is high time this Congress commenced to take cognizance of the financial condition of the National Treasury. It is a significant fact that each time this bill has been changed by the Committee of the Whole the appropriation has been increased, and already the increases made by the Committee of the Whole aggregate three-quarters of a million dollars. The bill as reported out by the committee carries $103,000,000, as compared with a similar bill reported out and passed by the Sixty-fifth Congress, which totaled $127,000,000. Some two months ago this House passed a river and harbor bill, which has justly been dubbed by a leading Democrat as a "razorback bill," because it was utterly devoid of pork. The Republicans of this House are desirous of practicing rigid economy, but when the Democrats stand almost as one man for raids upon the Treasury and they can secure enough recruits on this side, then, of course, it is not possible to follow out the promise which we made to the people and which the majority of us are desirous of making good.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KNUTSON. I regret I have not the time. I have only five minutes.

The committee having this bill in charge held hearings for two and one-half months, and the hearings consist of 2,600 pages. I want to ask this House in all seriousness who is better able to pass upon the merits of these questions, the committee which considered all these items in detail, or we who are obliged to take popgun consideration of the items as they come up? There is not a Member outside of the committee who is thoroughly familiar with these items. I want to say that it is the duty of the House to take the word of the majority of the committee on these items, especially when the items have been cut down. If the committee came in here with greatly increased appropriations, then the House should question such increases. But when the committee has taken into consideration the condition of the Federal Treasury and has shown a disposition to pare all appropriations to the bone, the House in all decency should stand by the committee as one man. [Applause.]

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], much as I regret to disagree with the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. WOOD]. This amendment is intended to increase the amount in this bill from $50,000 to $100,000, thereby placing the figures the same as they are under existing law.

Now, I believe every Member of this House intends to be for economy; but there is a vast difference between economy which means to serve the public and economy which means to injure the foreign trade of our country.

It seems to me that if there is one item in this bill which means to encourage not only exportation but importation as well, thereby increasing the revenues of our Government, this is the very item that should be increased, and I hope this amendment will be agreed to and the amount allowed. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I heard with keen attention the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] in reference to economy. What is meant by economy in Government operations? It means the getting of 100 cents' worth of return for the Government from an expenditure of $1. To follow his suggestion, we might as well proceed and say we will not have any heat in an office, in our homes, or here in the House, for example, and not run the elevators in the House Office Building, simply because having heat and running elevators will cost money.

Now, the committee may have heard a large number of gentlemen, and certainly did hear some; but when the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] claims that the committee is more familiar with all the items that appear in this bill than anyone else, he is very greatly in error. I doubt if the committee has kept in close touch with the work that these commercial attachés have been doing either in Siberia, Japan, or China. It is to the disgrace of America that at this very moment at Vladivostok, Chiatas, Tokyo, Mukden, and numerous other places, where millions of trade is to be obtained by America, we have no representatives or too few. If we had representatives over there, we would be able to get answers to cable dispatches in less than 14 days, which it is taking at the present time, and millions of dollars of furs would now be on their way here.

Great Britain throughout Japan and China and Siberia during the entire war period made its most thorough preparations for pushing its commercial trade and had its men over there, not one man at each place but at least half a dozen at each place; and if my friends on the committee had consulted this bureau they would have learned the urgent necessity of inserting far more than the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has asked for. We can not get business without seeking it at the place where it is to be had.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Do I gather from the remarks of my friend from New York that the Republican whip has not popped over the gentleman's head?

Mr. SIEGEL. The whip has not popped over the gentleman's head, and I think my votes since I have been here will show an independence of spirit on my part all the time when the good of the country is involved, and therefore I am in favor of this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now rises on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of this bill we passed over page 126, which has to do with regulating the number of employees. In order to perfect the bill in accordance with the amendments which have been adopted, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, that motion is not in order at the present time. We have not agreed to return to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that that paragraph was passed over without prejudice. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Pennsylvania should move to return to that paragraph.

Mr. WASON. That was my point.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE].

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. VARE: Amend, on page 127, line 12, by striking out the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

Amend, on page 127, line 17, by striking out the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fourteen."

Amend, on page 127, line 18, by striking out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve."

Amend, on page 127, line 18, by striking out the first word "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-two."

Amend, on page 127, line 18, by striking out the second word "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty-five."

Amend, on page 127, line 19, by striking out "messenger" and insert in lieu thereof "two messengers."

Amend, on page 127, line 21, by striking out "$162,470" and insert in lieu thereof "$220,510."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, as a substitute for that, in order that it may all be voted upon at the same time, I move as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that on page 127 we strike out all of that paragraph and insert the following.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment by way of substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. SISSON: On page 127 strike out the paragraph beginning on line 10 and ending on line 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce: Director, $6,000; assistant directors—1 $3,500, 1 $3,000; private secretary, $1,800; 10 chiefs of divisions, at $2,500 each; assistant chief of division, $2,250; chief clerk, $2,250; expert on commerce and finance, $2,000; commercial economist, $2,750; chiefs of sections—1 $2,500, 1 $2,000; translators—1 $2,000, 1 $1,800, 2 at $1,400 each; editorial assistant, $2,000; clerks—14 of class 4, 12 of class 3, 2 at $1,500 each, 22 of class 2, 35 of class 1, 20 at $1,000 each, 14 at $900 each; two messengers; 4 assistant messengers; laborer; two messenger boys, at $420 each; in all, $220,510.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I think that substitute is practically the same as the various amendments offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE]. It is exactly the current law. When you restore all of these other activities which we have voted to restore it will be necessary that the Washington force be retained at what it now is as provided in the current law. By adopting this substitute we will have only one vote, whereas if we adopted the various amendments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania it might mean several votes.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I am in full accord with the statement made by the gentleman from Mississippi, and with the permission of the committee I will withdraw the amendment I offered and ask that the gentleman's substitute be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be permitted to withdraw his amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The amendment of Mr. SISSON was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Inspectors of hulls and inspectors of boilers, as authorized by law, $225,900.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a couple of questions concerning this paragraph.

Beginning on line 8, providing for the inspectors of hulls and inspectors of boilers, I see that the gross amount allowed is $225,900. According to the statements in the hearings I think there are 48 inspectors of hulls and 48 inspectors of boilers, making 96 inspectors of hulls and boilers. That amount, according to my figuring, would give $2,253.12 each, which is a less amount than the assistant inspectors of hulls and boilers at the city of New York receive, and only $3 more than the assistant inspectors all along the Atlantic seaboard and Gulf receive. I will ask the chairman if my figures are correct, and if there are 96 inspectors of hulls and boilers in the 48 districts?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; there are 48 inspectors of hulls and 48 inspectors of boilers.

Mr. MILLER. That would make 96, and they would receive, according to my figures, $2,253 each. I am asking how the committee arrived at the figures giving the assistant inspectors at New York more than the inspector at New York receives?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The pay of these inspectors and assistant inspectors is fixed by law, and this diversity of pay arises from different laws passed at different times fixing these different salaries. No doubt there should be some provision for an equalization of these salaries.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to ask the gentleman what law he refers to that fixes the pay of these inspectors?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will refer the gentleman to the law in a moment. We can not equalize these salaries in this bill. It would be an interminable job.

Mr. MILLER. They can be equalized in such a way that the assistant will not receive more than the inspector receives.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There may be occasion for the assistant inspectors at some places receiving more than the inspectors receive at some other places.

Mr. MILLER. No; in the city of New York the assistant inspectors receive $2,500, and provision is made in this bill for that amount, while the inspector receives $2,253.12.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It may be that the assistant inspector is the man who really does the work and that the inspector is a mere supernumerary.

Mr. MILLER. Then, I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there are 40 of them in the city of New York, and they receive $2,500 each.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I call the attention of the gentleman to the statute. It is quite a long one. It is Public Act 183 of the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. MILLER. What does this purport to do?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will ask the gentleman to take it and read it.

Mr. MILLER. Does it purport to fix the salaries in the amounts carried in the bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; it fixes the salaries by districts.

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant inspectors, as authorized by law, for the following ports: New York, 40, at $2,500 each; New Orleans, 6 at $2,350 each; Baltimore, 10 at $2,350 each; Providence, 4 at $2,350 each; Boston 10 at $2,350 each; Philadelphia, 16 at $2,350 each; San Francisco, 16 at $2,350 each; Buffalo, 8 at $2,100 each; Cleveland, 10 at $2,100 each; Milwaukee, 4 at $2,100 each; Chicago, 5 at $2,100 each; Grand Haven, 4 at $2,100 each; Detroit, 4 at $2,100 each; Norfolk, 10 at $2,100 each; Seattle, 16 at $2,100 each; Portland (Oreg.), 6 at $2,100 each; Albany (N. Y.), 2 at $2,100 each; Duluth, 2 at $2,100 each; Portland (Me.), 2 at $2,100 each; New London, 2 at $2,100 each; Los Angeles, 2 at $2,100 each; New Haven, 2 at $2,100 each; Jacksonville, 2 at $2,100 each; Pittsburgh, 1 at $2,100; Toledo, 2 at $2,100 each; 4 traveling inspectors, at $3,000 each; $434,100.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER: Page 129, line 11, strike out the figures "$2,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,269," and in lines 12, 13, 14, and 15, page 129, wherever the figures "$2,350" appear, strike out the same and insert the figures "$2,269," and in lines 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, page 129, wherever the figures "$2,100" appear, strike out the same and insert the figures "$2,269," and on page 130, line 1, strike out the figures "$2,100" and insert the figures "$2,269."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is new legislation, and that it changes the salaries of officers fixed by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations point out to me the statute fixing the salaries of these assistant inspectors of hulls and boilers? I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that the enumeration of the number of assistant inspectors of hulls and boilers, on pages 129 and 130, amounts to 186, while the hearings give 165.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That has nothing to do with the point of order.

Mr. MILLER. No. We will discuss the point of order first. I am interested in the legislation that fixes the amount of the salaries of these inspectors of hulls and boilers.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the gentleman will read the act to which I called his attention a moment ago he will find that the inspectors of hulls and boilers in the districts and ports enumerated in the preceding paragraph, in which they are all enumerated, shall be entitled to the following salaries, to be paid under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, namely:

And in addition the Secretary of Commerce may appoint, in districts or ports where the volume of work requires them, assistant inspectors, at a salary, for the port of New York of $2,500 a year each; for the port of New Orleans, La.; the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; Baltimore, Md.; the ports of Boston, Mass.; Providence, R. I.; and the district of San Francisco, Calif., at $2,350 per year each, and for all other districts and ports at a salary of $2,100 a year each.

Mr. MILLER. That is the law that I have been searching for.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say that this is one of the few acts passed during the war for the purpose of increasing the salaries of these gentlemen because their work was increased largely during the war.

Mr. MILLER. The bill changes somewhat this schedule.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Not in the least.

Mr. MILLER. The bill provides that in the district of Detroit they shall have $2,300, I think.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; $2,100. It is $2,100 in the bill and $2,100 in the law.

Mr. MILLER. On the bottom of page 673 of this law it provides that the district of Oswego; Detroit, Mich.; Mobile, Ala.; the port of St. Louis; the port of Huron, in Michigan, it shall be $2,350 for each local inspector.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. For the inspector. I thought the gentleman was talking about the assistant inspectors.

Mr. MILLER. Does the chairman of the committee mean to say that the appropriation contained in the paragraph, commencing on line 8, page 129, will provide a salary in that sum?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If you take line 9, page 129, providing for a lump-sum appropriation of $225,900, that will pay for the inspectors, and there is designated assistant inspectors for the several amounts which will pay for all those assistant inspectors in accordance with the law.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman mean to say that 186 assistant inspectors mentioned in the bill, with a gross appropriation of $225,900, would supply the assistant inspectors at the rate of $2,350 each?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I want to call the attention of the chairman to the fact that by my figures it will not do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen are traveling outside of the point of order. Does the gentleman from Washington wish to discuss the point of order?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the point of order seems to be well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to strike out the paragraph beginning on line 10, page 129, and ending on line 2, page 130.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the chairman of this committee [Mr. WOOD] and also the attention of the majority leader [Mr. MONDELL] to the fact that this paragraph appropriates $434,100 to provide for 190 assistant inspectors at 25 ports in the United States. In the preceding paragraph of this bill there is appropriated $22,940 for Steamboat-Inspection Service, including the supervising inspector general and various other officers.

In the next paragraph there is appropriated $37,950 for steamboat inspectors covering 11 supervising inspectors. In the next paragraph there is appropriated $225,900 for the inspectors of hulls and boilers. And then, in this paragraph which I have made a motion to strike out, it provides an appropriation of $434,100 for 190 additional assistant inspectors. I want to say that it is more inspectors than is authorized by law. It is more inspectors than are necessary to perform the service at these 25 ports. And the next paragraph provides $115,000 for clerical expenses, and the next paragraph provides $160,000 for contingent expenses of this Steamboat-Inspection Service.

Now, after all this talk that we have heard here favoring economy and the economy speech just made by the Republican whip, Mr. KNUTSON, of Minnesota, against certain new appropriations, when you go to vote on the appropriation the only votes you could get on this side in support of that line of argument, besides the chairman of the committee and his secretary sitting beside him, were so few that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] did not even ask for a division.

I want to say that if we do not begin real economy by acts and not words there is not going to be any retrenchment. It is futile to talk about economy unless we vote for it when the time comes to vote. I again call the attention of the chairman to the fact that in this bill there are 1,076 messengers provided; that in this bill there are 515 watchmen provided; patronage positions, most of them; patronage positions, if you please, and you know it as well as I do. The fellows filling these places perform very little service to the Government of any value. How long are you going to keep them on the pay roll when they are not necessary?

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a minute; I want to get a few facts before the committee. Now, take the passenger ships, for instance. The chairman of this committee knows that the law and regulations require the inspection of passenger-carrying ships only every three months, or four times a year. The chairman of this committee also knows that the freight-carrying ships are not required to be inspected but once a year. That being the case, why is it necessary in this bill to provide for 190 assistant inspectors at a cost of $434,100, in addition to the other inspector forces allowed in this bill? I was greatly amused the other day at a little episode——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TILSON). The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more in order that I may yield to gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE. Reserving the right to object, I want the gentleman to confine himself to his amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I will not go outside the bill.

Mr. BURKE. Nor outside the paragraph which the gentleman moved to strike out.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants to object, he can; I am not going outside the bill.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object unless the gentleman confines himself to the section that he moves to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. No objection is heard to the request of the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that I am with every man in this House who really wants to get back to prewar, normal conditions. I want to be of assistance, if I can, to the gentleman from Iowa, the great chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GOOD], in eliminating all waste and extravagance. I want to be of real assistance to the majority leader of this House, if I can, in bringing about real economy; but when the majority leader blows first hot and then cold, as he did when he went before this committee and said, "Gentlemen, I want you to use the snickersnee"—and that is what the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] said he said—"I want you to use the snickersnee in cutting down these appropriations," and the committee replied, "Will the gentleman stand behind us if we use the snickersnee?"——

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. That has nothing to do with the gentleman's motion. We want to get this bill passed.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman does not want to get my ire roiled up, because if he does, he will be two or three weeks in getting this bill through. If you can not give me five minutes to talk about the gentleman from Wyoming and his snickersnee, it will take three weeks to get the bill through.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Texas, I insist upon my point of order. I will call the gentleman's snickersnee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad that we have a distinguished parliamentarian in the chair [Mr. TILSON]—one of the best parliamentarians in the House—to decide on this question, because he knows there is some latitude allowed in debate. I am discussing the question of striking $434,000 out of this bill, contained in this paragraph. I shall confine myself to the question, but when the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming admonished this committee to use the snickersnee, and the committee used it, and they struck out of this bill the unnecessary 13 surveyors general and their incident expenses of $181,315 per year, that were not needed——

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The surveyors general are not being considered now, and it is not germane to the steamboat-inspection item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will confine himself to the rules.

Mr. BLANTON. I am well acquainted with the rules, and I am not going to get outside of them. It is the ignorance of the gentleman from New Hampshire of the rules that prompts him to make the point of order.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois to propound a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BLANTON. Do not take this out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois can not make a parliamentary inquiry without the permission of the gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. I will show you where the steamboat part of it came in. After the committee had used the snickersnee and cut out these 13 surveyors general, one of which was in Wyoming, and their incident expenses of $181,315 per year, we found the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the majority leader, who by lip service says he is in favor of economy, coming onto the floor of the House and whipping the boys into line and putting those 13 surveyors general back into the bill, and he thus added to this bill thereby $187,315.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, do not take this out of my time. I know the gentleman from New Hampshire does not like this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will suspend until the gentleman from New Hampshire states his point of order.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is that reference to the General Land Office appropriation is not germane to this paragraph, which relates to the inspection of boats, hulls, and boilers. I have made the point two or three times, and I now insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas knows the rules of the House, and the Chair will admonish him to observe them.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no difference between the Chairman and myself, because both of us know the rules. The gentleman from New Hampshire ought not to be wasting the time of the committee in this way. When the snickersnee was used by the committee their effort was thwarted by the action of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and when the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] called the attention of the House to that fact, then we found our distinguished majority leader going around to him before the RECORD was printed and keeping him from putting his speech in the RECORD.

Mr. WASON rose.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want all of my time taken up by these interruptions.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry that I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, the majority leader is not a member of this committee and had nothing to do with writing the bill. All of these remarks relating to the conduct or the attitude of the majority leader are not germane to this section, which the gentleman from Texas has moved to strike out. I ask the Chair to enforce the rule.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if you will take the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 27, 1920——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will suspend.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be allowed to proceed for the remainder of his time as he pleases.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, since they have used up all of my time I ask for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be allowed to consume the remainder of his time without interruption. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. And since I have been interrupted so much, I ask that I have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for three additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the gentleman's case of itch has been cured and that I can proceed without interruption. What I am trying to get at is that when it comes to spending money in some other districts of the United States that do not affect Wyoming the distinguished majority leader on the other side is in favor of applying the snickersnee, but when you eliminate an item that prevents money spending in the State of Wyoming the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming forgets all about his snickersnee and his economy, and he then steamboats back into the bill appropriations which the distinguished economy committee has cut out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield, as I have not the time. You take the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 27, and you will see where the distingushed gentleman from Wyoming was instrumental in putting back into this bill $187,315, which my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] had faithfully and carefully cut out of this bill under the direction and the recommendation of the Land Commissioner. Let me read what the Land Commissioner says. Now, speaking of these 13 surveyors general, I read from page 1151 of the record of the hearings, where Hon. Clay Tallman, Land Commissioner, said:

> We could handle that work in a consolidated office, without any doubt, for much less than we are handling it now and much better.

He said further:

> The way to handle that business is to consolidate the offices into one big organization with a somewhat reduced force; instead of 13 heads, 1 head, and instead 13 chief clerks, 1 chief clerk.

And following his recommendation, the recommendation of Hon. Clay Tallman, the Land Commissioner of the United States, and also following the admonition of the distinguished Republican leader, the gentleman from Wyoming, that the committee should economize and use the snickersnee this committee cut out of this bill the 13 surveyors general and this appropriation of $187,315, and then the gentleman from Wyoming comes back here and has it put back into the bill. Is that economy? I want to say that this committee bill has been amended so many times and in so many instances and with such various and sundry added large appropriations that the committee itself would not know it if it were to go back into the committee room and they should reconsider it. It has been changed——

Mr. KNUTSON. By Democratic votes.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota ought to know that without Republican votes no change could have been made.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rose to protect the gentleman. The gentleman will not interrupt a gentleman without rising.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not need protection. I can protect myself if the Chair will not rule me out of order. Now, what are you gentlemen going to do? You are either in favor of economy or you are not. You are either going to retrench or you are not. What are you going to do? I want to say that if you will follow the advice of the gentleman from Wyoming and really apply the snickersnee, which is a cutting instrument that cuts to the bone, to these appropriation bills and cut right down to the bone, then we will perform our duty and nothing less than that will be our duty. Facing a deficit of over $3,000,000,000, with talk such as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made this morning when he indicated that another bond issue would place our bonds down to such an extent that our people hardly would buy them, what are you going to do, you business men of this House? Are you business men?, Why, what do you do when you personally get embarrassed financially? Do not you draw in and stop all waste and extravagance? Do not you retrench, do not you stop needless expenditures, and do not you economize? Let us get down to it in the real sense and in dead earnest.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in reference to the paragraph concerning which this motion was made.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a pro forma amendment, and I desire to withdraw it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have the floor to speak in reference to this paragraph. The paragraph involves the payment of salaries of 385 servants of the Government. In the city of Washington there are very few, and a large majority of these inspectors are around at the different ports throughout the country. We gave the current law. That current law, if you please, was passed by a Democratic Congress, and these salaries were fixed by that act. The representatives of this bureau came before the committee asking for a largely increased appropriation, which was denied them. I wish to say, however, in justification of the action of the committee in making this appropriation that the business of this department has increased more than one hundredfold since the passage of the law itself, and will increase for some considerable time at least, and if the program in reference to our shipping is to be carried out it will constantly increase. These inspectors have not only to inspect the hulls of all passenger-going vessels of this country but they have to inspect the hulls of every vessel that carries 25 passengers, whether they be employees upon the ship or passengers traveling as such. In addition to that, they have to inspect all the boilers and all the machinery pertaining to the operation of all these vessels where they carry 25 passengers. No matter where they are, whether connected with the passenger shipping of this country or whether it is part of the merchant marine, that comes under the supervision of this department. To my mind it is one of the most important functions of our Government that safety may be had in regard to the cargoes that are plying the deep, and especially the lives of the people who entrust themselves upon those vessels with the assurance of safety given them by reason of the investigation and inspection made by these Government officers. To my mind the appropriation which has been made is justified by the action of the Congress that created these officers and fixed their salaries and justified certainly by the increasing demand for their services and justified by every act of common humanity.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I understood the gentleman has withdrawn his motion to strike out the paragraph, and I move to strike out the last word. I simply want to say, in addition to what the chairman of this committee has said, that prior to the inspection provided for in the law many very disastrous accidents happened. There were a great many lives lost, and I agree with the chairman of the subcommittee that this money is well spent, not only because of the fact that inspection does great good but the fact that the owners of the vessels know that the inspection is going to be made accomplishes a great deal of good. It is true, as the gentleman from Indiana stated, that there was a considerable demand for increase of salaries; but within the year the Interstate Commerce Committee reported a bill reorganizing this service, making districts throughout the United States and fixing the salaries which they thought were proper.

That being such recent action, the committee did not feel justified in increasing any of the salaries; but we did not reduce any salaries. Certainly it would be a great mistake for the Congress to decrease the service, for thousands of lives might be lost on some vessel because not inspected; and this service not only inspects our own vessels but it inspects foreign vessels coming into our ports, and the captains of the vessels are required to keep certificates that show that their vessels have been inspected, and when. My recollection of the law is that they must be inspected every six months or as often as the officials controlling this service deem fit and proper. This is for the purpose of preserving and protecting human life, and we do not feel that the service is too expensive when that is taken into consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Shipping service: For shipping commissioners in amounts not exceeding the following: Baltimore, $2,000; Boston, $3,000; New Bedford, $1,200; New Orleans, $2,500; Newport News, $1,500; New York, $5,000; Norfolk, $1,800; Philadelphia, $2,400; Portland, Me., $1,300; Seattle, $3,500; Providence, $1,800; Galveston, $1,500; San Francisco, $3,000; in all, $30,500.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND of Virginia: Page 131, line 4, after the words "Newport News," strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,800."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The item is not subject to a point of order. There is no basic law fixing these salaries.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is new legislation, though, increasing the salary.

Mr. DUPRÉ. There is no law that limits it and no legislation that fixes these items. They are fixed from year to year by the Congress. The only limitation is that the pay shall not exceed $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] make the point of order?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it will be noticed in this paragraph that there have been three increases over the appropriations of last year. Baltimore has been increased from $1,200 to $2,000; New Orleans has been increased from $1,500 to $2,500; and Norfolk, which is 14 miles away from Newport News, with comparatively the same volume of business, has been increased from $1,500 to $1,800. I notice in the hearings that the recommendation which was made by the commissioner was for an increase for Baltimore from $1,200 to $2,000, which has been granted; Boston, from $3,000 to $3,500; New Orleans, $1,500 to $2,400, which has been granted, and an increase of $100 additional; Newport News, from $1,500 to $2,000; Norfolk, from $1,500 to $2,000; Philadelphia, from $2,400 to $3,000; Portland, Me., $1,300 to $1,800; and Galveston, from $1,500 to $1,800.

Now, I do not know upon what theory the committee has justified the increase from $1,500 to $1,800 for Norfolk, which is 14 miles away and doing comparatively the same volume of foreign business, and has failed to grant an increase for Newport News. So far as the report of the commissioner is concerned, it shows that both ports would be entitled to an increase. I submit that each port is entitled to the $1,800, and not alone because of local reasons, since it costs just as much to live in one place as the other, but also for the protection of the public, as there should be in these ports competent officials.

I find on page 1481 of the hearings that these officers exercise quasi judicial functions in the settlement of disputes as to wages, overtime, breaches of discipline, and similar matters. If that be true, and if it is the purpose of the Congress to try to develop the maritime business of the United States and to preserve and protect the interests of the crews of the vessels, I submit it is our duty to provide competent men to discharge these services. And $1,800 having been fixed as the proper sum for the city of Norfolk, I ask for another city, doing comparatively the same business, 14 miles away, that the same increase be allowed.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will state that these salaries have been fixed from time to time based on the amount of work done at the respective places. The committee did raise the salaries of some of these places simply because of the increase of the amount of business and also lowered some because of the decreased amount of business, notably San Francisco, which was lowered $1,000. Now, the amount of business at Newport News is reflected by the number of discharges, which for a year, in round numbers, were 3,000, while at Norfolk, with which the gentleman from Virginia makes comparison, there were practically 15,000 discharges. So that, according to the basis of work performed, the Norfolk port is five times more important than the one at Newport News.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. What report is that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. This is the annual report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1919, which is the latest report we have on this proposition.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Supposed to be given for each particular place?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is given for Newport News and all the rest of them. So the committee in its action as to Newport News has been liberal as compared with even Norfolk. If we followed out the basis of fixing these salaries, we should have raised considerably more than we did raise this office at Norfolk and should have reduced the one at Newport News.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that I think the subcommittee were absolutely fair in fixing these salaries, because we took the amount of business transacted, and after we had agreed on the amount of business we determined the salaries. The committee were controlled exactly by that. Now, Newport News happened to fall below that level and Norfolk happened to go above it. We treated every city exactly alike, and we exercised all the care we could to see that no city was discriminated against in the least.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12610) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

RETURN OF RESIDENTS OF POLISH ORIGIN.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 156, being a resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to bring back on Army transports from Danzig, Poland, residents of the United States of Polish origin who were engaged in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers. That there shall be not to exceed one hour of general debate, one-half to be controlled by Mr. KAHN and one-half by Mr. ———. At the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule; whereupon the resolution shall be reported to the House with the amendments, if any, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to bring immediately before the House for consideration Senate joint resolution No. 156, enabling the War Department to bring back to the United States between 8,000 and 10,000 Polish citizens who, previous to our entrance into the war, joined the Allies and were taken over at the expense of the French and British Governments. They served with the Polish contingent of the army. They are over there without any means of returning to their homes. Their families are here. A transport will be leaving Danzig on Saturday. Many of these people can take passage on that transport if this resolution passes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. SISSON. I was wondering if the committee understood that the resolution was to be called up at once. I do not see any Democratic members of the Committee on Rules here.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This is a unanimous report of the committee, and I stated to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that I would call it up at this time.

Mr. SISSON. Then it was understood that it was to be called up at this time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Does the gentleman know that the Secretary of War is now bringing back 36,000 Czecho-Slovaks on transports which have been remodeled and equipped with refrigerating apparatus, so that they can bring them back through the Suez Canal without any authority of law? Why has not the War Department authority to bring these Poles back?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not know as to that. All I know is that the Secretary desires this authority. He called me up by telephone yesterday and emphasized the importance of having this resolution passed at as early a day as possible. The Senate passed the joint resolution with a preamble. The House committee changed the joint resolution by striking out the preamble, so that it will be necessary to send the resolution back to the Senate for concurrence in the amendment.

I see no reason for further discussion of the matter at this time. So I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on Senate joint resolution 156.

Mr. GARRETT. Why does not the gentleman ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is provided for in the rule.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman can ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee on the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think that ought to be done if the rule provides for it. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 156, authorizing the Secretary of War to bring back on Army transports from Danzig, Poland, residents of the United States of Polish origin who served in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers, with Mr. MANN of Illinois in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 156, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 156) authorizing the Secretary of War to bring back on Army transports from Danzig, Poland, residents of the United States of Polish origin who were engaged in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers.

Whereas there are now in concentration camps at or near Warsaw, Poland, and have been since November, 1919, upward of 12,000 residents of the United States of Polish origin who were equipped and transported at the expense of Great Britain and France from the United States to Poland, and who were engaged in active service in behalf of the allied cause during the war; and

Whereas they are desirous of returning to their homes in this country and are without means to accomplish such repatriation: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That authority be, and hereby is, given to the Secretary of War to use such Army transports as may be available to bring back to the United States from Danzig, Poland, such residents of the United States of Polish origin as were engaged in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The time was to be equally divided between the gentleman from Michigan and some other one—15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan was recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The general debate is confined to 15 minutes, and that time is to be divided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair misunderstood. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] is recognized for seven and a half minutes.

Mr. QUIN. I would like to have the other seven and a half minutes.

[Mr. JAMES addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Chair to notify me when I have used four minutes.

This matter does not involve a great many people, but it involves justice to the few who are concerned. My understanding is that these poor fellows can not get back to their wives and children in this country unless the United States Government brings them on transports, just as it brought back our own soldiers. The Committee on Military Affairs see no reason on earth why the Government should not bring them back, and it is manifestly the duty of this Government to bring these Poles back free of charge, because they voluntarily went to fight in the interests of the allied Governments against the Germans and Austrians and the Turks. The evidence is that these 26,000 men could not be inducted into the United States Army under the draft law, and would not have been in the Army at all, and could have been here holding their jobs in this country and staying with their families. I knew nothing about this matter until it came before the committee. This proposition is favored by the War Department, by the State Department, and by the Chief Executive. I certainly trust that every man on this floor will agree to the passage of this resolution, so that it will go to the Senate this afternoon and become a law, in order that these people can get on the transport Saturday and start for the United States. We need their labor here and they ought to be allowed to come back at the expense of our Government.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three and one-half minutes.

Mr. JAMES. I yield one and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KLECZKA].

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Chairman, the adoption of the pending resolution will authorize the Secretary of War to bring back on our Army transports from Danzig, Poland, residents of the United States of Polish origin who enlisted in the Polish Army and who were engaged in the World War on the side of America and the allied powers.

The formal recognition of the Polish Army by the War Department on behalf of the United States Government was given by a formal pronunciamento of the War Department issued on October 6, 1917.

The Polish Army in America has been created in an atmosphere of lofty patriotism which bordered on the sublime. Its recruiting meetings were almost religious festivals; the farewells of the Polish boys were soul stirring, and the sacrifices and hardships endured have been heroic.

It was a momentous occasion when Mr. Paderewski made his first appeal in the city of Chicago for volunteers for this Polish Army. Men and boys rose from their seats in the great hall and stood before the platform from which he was speaking and solemnly took the volunteer's oath. Laborers, college professors, lawyers, doctors, chemists, and journalists enthusiastically responded to the call. The sacrifice which they were prepared to make was an extraordinary one, for it meant leaving America; it meant service in France without compensation and without any provision either for the support of their families while absent or for payment of insurance in case of death. Yet Polish mothers willingly gave their sons, and wives their husbands, for the cause of universal liberty and world democracy. During the trying period of the war their dominant note of action was one of service and sacrifice, and their ruling passion was to offer all they had and all they were in order that despotic militarism and autocratic rule might be destroyed from the earth. Their enthusiasm was one born not alone of a Polish or national but also of a world-wide impulse to advance the rights of humanity and the cause of civilization and democracy against the most unrelenting foes.

It was this spirit which aroused the admiration of our Secretary of War, who, writing to the Polish National Committee, said:

> Now that the Polish National Committee and its coordinate national department in this country have actually succeeded in organizing and dispatching to Europe a large body of troops for the Polish Army, which is to cooperate on the western front with the allied armies there defending the principles of liberty and justice, I take this occasion to congratulate you upon the achievement.
> This American contingent of the Polish Army is made up of volunteers who are not covered by American draft regulations. The men in it are, therefore, moved by the inspiration of the principles involved on the allied side in this conflict, and their presence on the western front, representing both their adherence to America, as the country of their adoption, and Poland, free and self-governing, as the country of their extraction, will be a stimulating and inspiring sight. In the meantime it will be wholesome to have the people of the United States realize the circumstances under which the Polish contingent is formed in order that they may more widely understand and appreciate the high motives which have animated these fellow citizens of Polish extraction who up to this time have formed a part of the population of the United States.

The Polish Army in France was recognized as a cobelligerent and allied force by the Governments of the Entente. This Army, under the command of Gen. Joseph Haller, was like the other armies, the mighty forces of America included, subject to the direction of Gen. Foch. The American Government also recognized this army as autonomous, allied, and cobelligerent. In a communication to the National Polish Committee, whose headquarters were at Paris, France, Secretary of State, Mr. Robert Lansing, declared:

> I beg to inform you that the Government of the United States has not been unmindful of the zeal and tenacity with which the Polish National Committee has prosecuted the task of marshaling its fellow countrymen in a supreme military effort to free Poland from its present oppressors.
> This Government's position with respect to the Polish cause and the Polish people could hardly be more clearly defined than was outlined by the President in his address before the Congress of January 8, 1918. Therefore, feeling, as it does, a deep sympathy for the Polish people and viewing with gratification the progress of the Polish cause, this Government experiences a feeling of genuine satisfaction in being able to comply with your request by recognizing the Polish Army, under the supreme political authority of the Polish National Committee, as autonomous and cobelligerent.

During the campaign of recruiting for this Army many efforts were made by hostile and inimical forces to discourage enlistments. But the Poles were immune to the poisonous bite of the serpent of sedition. No propaganda could stifle their ardor and enthusiasm in the days of lofty resolution and unflinching determination. No ingenuity could devise the means that would destroy the Poles' faith in America's noble purpose. Twenty-four thousand six hundred men from this country joined the Polish Army. Of this number about 15 per cent were American citizens, who, because of over age or physical disqualifications, were ineligible to join the American forces. About 20 per cent of that number were Polish aliens, who made their declaration of intention to become American citizens, but who were not subject to the draft and were ineligible to join our Army. The remaining 65 per cent were Polish aliens, who because of the accident of birth on German or Austrian soil were unable under the war regulations to join the forces of this country. This indeed furnishes an inspiring spectacle. We were told that the period of the World War was "time that tried men's souls." There were many slackers who because of cowardice and disloyalty offered the sickening excuse that they would not engage in a fratricidal war. What a comfort and inspiration did the Poles afford in striking contrast. There were very many Poles compelled by force to serve in the German and the Austrian armies. Did this deter the Poles in America from answering humanity's call? Did they cringe and shrink and falter? Emphatically no! They understood full well the uncontrollable decrees of cruel fate. They heard the summons of duty and heedless of home and family ties, and grief and heartaches, they answered mankind's prayer.

The Poles did not hesitate one moment to respond when the battle cry was sounded to make the world safe for democracy. [Applause.]

Recognizing in America's cause the cause of a common humanity, the just and glorious cause of the most sacred and inalienable birthrights and privileges of free men, they rallied to the support and defense of this grand Republic of ours with every ounce of their strength and with all the ardor of their souls. [Applause.]

The cost of transportation of these Polish volunteers from America to France was borne by the French Government. While serving in the Polish Army under Gen. Haller they were given an allowance by the French Government of 25 centimes per day, which, according to normal exchange, was the equivalent to 5 cents in American money. The benefits of the war-risk insurance and the compensation act which were accorded to the American soldier were not available to these men. Inspired by the glorious, unselfish, and heroic mission of America, their adopted land, they would not allow these hardships to keep them back, for their hearts were aflame with zeal for the cause they approved. The most highly prized and cherished emblem by the Polish mother was the service flag. Freely and cheerfully she offered her stalwart son in order that free governments might be preserved and perpetuated. In a great number of cases these volunteers had families and others dependent upon them for support and maintenance. Great hardships and sufferings as the result of these enlistments were cheerfully endured, and all burdens borne patriotically and courageously. Many families and dependents of these men were assisted and cared for by the Polish National Committee of America and by the American Red Cross.

There were in all 108,000 Polish emigrants, recruited from every corner of the habitable globe, fighting in France on the western front in the ranks of the Polish Army under Gen. Haller's command. They contributed in a large measure to the glorious victory won. [Applause.]

After the signing of the armistice they were transferred from France to the eastern front of Poland, where they were engaged in successfully resisting the invading forces of the Bolsheviki. Several months ago a large contingent of these men recruited from this country were released from service and have since lived in a demobilization camp near Warsaw, Poland. The latest advices are that about 12,000 of these men are in this concentration camp awaiting transportation back to America.

It is the intention of the War Department to have the American transports which go to Antwerp, carrying supplies to the Coblenz occupation army, proceed from Antwerp to Dantzig and bring on their return journey these demobilized soldiers of the Polish Army. They desire to speedily return to this country. Their return to America will mark the close of one of the most inspiring chapters of the history of the World War. They have proven themselves most worthy to become a part of this great and glorious Nation of ours.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the pending resolution will pass unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE].

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, in the district which I represent one of the local boards, of which I was a member, had 3,710 men between the ages of 21 and 31. Of that number nearly 2,000 were foreign born, and the rest were to a great extent sons of immigrants. Among them were many men of Polish birth. We sent for 100 of these young men who were not obliged to go into our Army and asked them if they desired to enter the service of this Nation or enlist in the Polish Army for France. Eighty of them went into the American Army and the balance chose the Polish Army in France. Some of these latter men are now in Poland without means to return to their families. They want to return to America, some to their parents and others to wives and children. On Saturday next a transport will sail from Danzig, Poland, and thousands of these soldiers who bore arms against terrific odds can be brought back here if we immediately pass this resolution. They carried to Poland the spirit of Pulaski and Kosciusko. They now desire to return and be part and parcel of our national life. They have demonstrated that their wish and hope is to live among us and be counted with us. Again and again we hear the charge that the foreigner comes here only to gain wealth and gold and return to spend his declining days in the land of his birth. Surely that charge can not be laid against these men, for they have their choice and they have decided they desire America first. Hundreds of their comrades would gladly make that same choice, but they are laid away, part of the great toll which this terrible war has demanded. These men would gladly pay their own way, but Poland paid only 5 cents a day to her soldiers. But on the field of battle these men paid their passage back to us, for their service was given in the fight against our enemy as well as theirs. Let us speed the transport to Poland, knowing well that she will return laden with men who forever will declare there is no other land like this land.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN].

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, as several hundred of these boys came from the district I have the honor to represent, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pending resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. BABKA and Mr. GOLDFOGLE were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House the Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That authority be, and hereby is, given to the Secretary of War to use such Army transports as may be available to bring back to the United States from Danzig, Poland, such residents of the United States of Polish origin as were engaged in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the preamble.

The Clerk reported the preamble, as follows:

Whereas there are now in concentration camps at or near Warsaw, Poland, and have been since November, 1919, upward of 12,000 residents of the United States of Polish origin who were equipped and transported at the expense of Great Britain and France from the United States to Poland and who were engaged in active service in behalf of the allied cause during the war; and

Whereas they are desirous of returning to their homes in this country and are without means to accomplish such repatriation: Therefore be it

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the preamble.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question? The bill as it passed the Senate carried the preamble. In other words, the amendment striking out the preamble is a House amendment?

Mr. JAMES. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, the preamble ought to be struck out. It looks as if the Senate would learn better than to put in preambles. Will it not delay the matter if the preamble is stricken out, and would it not be better as a practical proposition to pass it without the amendment?

Mr. JAMES. I think it would be better to strike it out, but I think it would save time to let it remain in.

Mr. GARRETT. The preamble ought to go out; but if it is going to cause delay in the matter, it had better remain in.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment striking out the preamble.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was rejected.

In pursuance of the order of the House, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MANN of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate joint resolution 156, and had instructed him to report the same back with the preamble, with the recommendation that the resolution and preamble be passed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JAMES, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12610, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To provide by cooperation of the Bureau of Standards, the War Department, and the Navy Department, for the standardization and testing of the standard gauges, screw threads, and standards requiring in manufacturing throughout the United States, and to calibrate and test such standard gauges, screw threads, and standards, including necessary equipment, and personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $40,000.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, line 19, page 138, by striking out the word "requiring" and inserting the word "required."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the paragraph under "Department of Labor," on page 143.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to correct a typographical error on line 6 by transposing the dollar sign and placing it before the figure 2.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will make the correction.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Commissioners of conciliation: To enable the Secretary of Labor to exercise the authority vested in him by section 8 of the act creating the Department of Labor, and to appoint commissioners of conciliation, for per diem in lieu of subsistence at not exceeding $4, traveling expenses, and not to exceed $12,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia, $100,000.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is not my purpose to offer any amendment at this time increasing the amount for the Division of Conciliation of the Department of Labor. If I read the report of the committee correctly, the Department of Labor is the one executive department here in the District of Columbia which has less employees on the roll now than it had in 1917. Notwithstanding that fact, probably the most important division, at least the division that is doing a very important work in connection with the Department of Labor, has had its appropriations slashed in two from the amount of money it had with which to do business during the fiscal year 1919–20. The Division of Conciliation in the Department of Labor has probably been engaged in its most important work. The growth of that department is a natural growth, and not the result of any particular war activity. Practically all of the large labor controversies were handled during the war by the War Labor Board. The Division of Conciliation was relieved to a large extent, due to the activities of the War Labor Board. Here is a division, the sole purpose of which is to mediate and conciliate in industrial disputes, to anticipate industrial disputes, and offer its services for the purpose of preventing strife, doing something to alleviate industrial controversies. Notwithstanding that fact, the committee saw fit to cut this appropriation to $100,000, whereas I believe the appropriation for the fiscal year 1919–20 was approximately $200,000. I have some figures with reference to the number of cases handled by these conciliators, who, by the way, are composed of employers of labor and also men who are skilled in conciliation work and the settlement of industrial disputes, some former executives of labor organizations, some large employers of labor. This department has been successful, and instead of crippling it I think we ought to encourage it. I think we ought to build up in this country some great governmental agency that will be able to step in where controversy threatens or where controversy or industrial conflict is already under way, and offer its services for the purpose of bringing employees and employer together, so that the conflict may be averted, and so that disputes may be mutually settled by both sides. I am sorry that the committee did not see its way clear to give the amount that this department has had for the past two years, to encourage it to go ahead and do its work.

At the present time in railroad legislation we are attempting in a somewhat similar way to bring together the contending forces. It is true that the workers have not taken very kindly to it, but they have agreed to give it a fair test under protest, and it seems to me that when we have one agency in connection with a department of labor that has been able to do good work in avoiding conflicts in industry, that instead of cutting the appropriations and retarding the work of that particular bureau we ought to encourage it, and it would appear to me that this agency should not be crippled by cutting the appropriation by 50 per cent at this time, but that the Department of Labor should be granted $200,000, the amount given during the last two fiscal years.

In relation to the amount recommended by the committee, $100,000, for the Division of Conciliation of the Department of Labor, which is a cut of $100,000 from the amounts granted by Congress for this service for each of the last two preceding fiscal years, I feel that the importance and value of this particular agency of the Government is not appreciated by many of the Members of this House, and I therefore desire to submit a few brief references from the Secretary of Labor's report and from the hearings before the Senate committee which have to do with the important work of this service. I may say in passing that I personally know of the valuable assistance rendered to employers and employees by the Division of Conciliation of the Department of Labor in my own State of California and on the Pacific coast generally.

This service was inaugurated when the Department of Labor came into existence in March, 1913, and there has been an increase in the number of cases handled by it annually year by year. In 1913–14 the number of cases handled was 33; in 1915, 42 cases; 1916, 227 cases; 1917, 378 cases; 1918, 1,217 cases; 1919, 1,780 cases, and I have ascertained from the records on file that since the date of the signing of the armistice, November 11, 1918, up to February 1 of the present year, the commissioners of conciliation of the Department of Labor have handled over 1,250 cases.

So that while it may be said that an abnormal increase in the number of cases presented occurred during the nearly two years that we were actually engaged in the war, yet it is clearly established that this division will be called upon now to handle in the neighborhood of 1,000 cases annually. Take the last fiscal year, with its 1,780 cases, and the fact that 1,011,000 persons were directly affected and 1,300,000 indirectly affected in the cases presented, and the further fact that these commissioners of conciliation, with an appropriation granted them of only $200,000, succeeded in adjusting all of the cases brought to their attention with the exception of 111 it would appear to me that this agency should not be crippled by cutting the appropriation 50 per cent at this time, but that the Department of Labor should be granted the $200,000, the amount given to it during the last two fiscal years.

I have actual knowledge of the fact that this branch of the service has worked out an agreement which makes for continued peace in the oil industry of the entire State of California, and that both the employers and the employees have a written agreement by which all questions that can not be adjusted by their grievance committees are submitted to a commissioner of conciliation appointed by the Secretary of Labor, whose decision is final and binding in all matters presented, and which means steady production and no cessation of work on the part of nearly 20,000 workers engaged in the oil industry of California.

I know also that this division has worked out a plan which made for uninterrupted production in the copper industry of Arizona, Nevada, Montana, New Mexico, and other copper-producing States, and that a commissioner of conciliation named by the Secretary of Labor has been accepted and has been acting for over two years as an administrator, and that his decision is final and binding on both the employers and the employees, and that not a single industrial dispute of more than minor importance did or will occur in that great industry so long as this arrangement continues in effect.

A similar arrangement has been worked out by the Department of Labor and its commissioners of conciliation between the employers and the employees of the five great meat-packing companies of Chicago, by which an administrator has been selected and agreed upon, whose decision is final and binding upon both parties, and there has been little or no trouble so far as working relations between the employer and the employees is concerned in that industry either during the war or since the signing of the armistice. I might say, further, that this arrangement has worked out so satisfactorily that the Department of Labor has received voluntarily acceptance of the same plan of adjustment that is in vogue for the big packing establishsments from nearly 30 of the independent meat-packing establishments in and about Chicago, and from other places throughout the country the packing houses are voluntarily coming in under the plan inaugurated and put into effect by the Division of Conciliation of the Department of Labor.

As to the practicality and the efficiency of this agency in these industries, and the fact that it is acceptable not only to the employers but also to the employees, can be readily ascertained by communicating with any one of the big oil companies of California, any one of the big copper mining operators in Arizona, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, or any other copper-producing State, or as to the successful working out of the plan in the meat-packing industry by communicating with any one of the five big packers of Chicago.

As to the present need of this service, I am informed only this morning, in answer to an inquiry made by me, of a report of the settlement of a grave dispute which did not result in a strike but which was adjusted while the men remained at work, involving muckers, miners, carpenters, and electricians, affecting various mining companies in Idaho. In another instance this morning a telegram reports the settlement secured by a commissioner of conciliation of a controversy at the Fort Smith Smelter Co., of the International Mine, Mill, and Smelters plant at Fort Smith, Ark. Another, the adjustment of a strike at the Pollak Steel Co., at Cincinnati, Ohio. And I also find that only this morning, in answer to my inquiry, four telegrams have been received from different sections of the United States asking for the good offices of the conciliation service in handling industrial disputes.

Another point I would like to impress upon you at this time is the fact that I find from the records that while these commissioners of conciliation do not generally intervene in a controversy unless requested to do so by one of three parties—the employer, the employees, or the public directly affected—that early in the life of this conciliation service 68 per cent of the cases presented were strikes, while now less than 20 per cent of the cases presented are strikes, and that of 80 cases being handled to-day not 20 of them have reached the strike stage; in the others being handled the employees are remaining at work and the commissioners of conciliation are working out an adjustment in each case without loss of production to the employers and without loss of wages to the workers.

These are a few brief facts that I would like to impress upon you in connection with this valuable service, and I feel that it is shortsighted policy for Congress at this time to cripple an agency which is contributing so much to industrial stabilization during this particular period. If you refuse to appropriate sufficient funds to continue this service as at present constituted, what will become of the industrial situation in the copper States, the oil situation in California, the packing industry, and the hundred and one other industrial situations less important but, in their aggregate, as important in this period of readjustment and reconstruction. Of all services in the Government this is one which I believe merits from this Congress every careful consideration.

It seems to me that this House in making its appropriations ought to take into consideration this question of stabilizing industry, and that we ought to try and encourage as much as we possibly can the bringing about of harmonious relations between employer and employee without interrupting the service. This is one agency of the Government that has gotten by with very little criticism. It is true that in one or two instances there has been some criticism of one or two of its agents in respect to political activity during the last congressional campaign, and also some criticism with respect to their actions in industrial disputes.

But, taking the entire record of this division, the thousands of cases they have handled, the millions of men who have become involved, I contend that this House ought to encourage the work of that division and ought to give it what it has asked for, so long as it is in reason, and increase the amount, increase the efficiency of that service, and I trust if the Senate sees fit to increase this amount that the members of this committee will agree to it in conference. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from California. I call the attention of the committee, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that this particular branch of our Department of Labor ought to recognize what is known in the United States as the principle of the open shop. As against what has been said in favor of this department, I might add that within my office files I have several hundred complaints from leading business institutions of this Nation which have come to me within the last 12 months complaining about the utter futility of this department to properly function, making the absolute assertion that instead of sending out an unbiased conciliator this department has been sending men who were in favor of only one side of the contention. For instance, a short time ago I put in the RECORD here a statement from the Public Ledger giving a concrete case that illustrates these various complaints, where in a tailors' strike a man was sent there by this department from Washington who had just a few days before sent an item for publication in the official organ of the strikers telling them that he was with them, sending a contribution of money out of his own pocket to help them make the fight a success, and telling them that they should carry the strike and the principles of that strike from one side of the United States to the other, and saying that he would send them shortly another contribution. And that kind of a man was sent up there to conciliate with employers who had granted every single demand of the strikers except one. And what was that demand? The thing that the employers would not grant was that they reserved the right to carry on what is known as the open shop, while the strikers demanded a closed shop and that no nonunion men be employed. What is the open shop? What does an open-shop establishment mean? It means merely that a man reserves the right in transacting his own business to employ men whether they belong to a union or not. In other words, that they will not be unfair to a man who belongs to organized labor, but that they will be fair alike to every laborer in the land; that the man who labors to earn his bread through the sweat of his brow, whether he belongs to a union or not, has a right to labor in their institutions. Up until about a year ago in the State of Texas, which in part I have the honor to represent, there was not an open-shop city in the State. The business men had been intimidated to such an extent that they were afraid to say a word against the demands and clamors of organized labor for closed shops. But the people of my State, thank God, have waked up, and now in every big city in my State to-day the principle of the open shop applies, through direct action of their chambers of commerce and open-shop associations. The cities of Texas are sending abroad throughout the land the invitation to all labor, "Come to our State; we need you; we will give you a square deal; we will protect you; we will give you a living wage." The State of Texas says to the laborers of the United States, "We do not care whether you are organized or not, come to the State of Texas and you can make a living here, be treated justly, receive a fair, square deal, and you can succeed."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. KNUTSON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I moved to strike out the last word. I have changed my mind, and I would like to strike out the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not do that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Did the Chair rule that I can not strike out the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can only withdraw his amendment by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman can not offer two amendments in succession.

Mr. BLANTON. But one was merely a pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Both are pro forma, but I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding as far as I am concerned.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to withdraw the amendment I offered.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. NOLAN. It was my amendment, and the gentleman rose in opposition to my amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I now make the motion to strike out the paragraph if the gentleman from Illinois will kindly yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If I have the floor, but I do not want to lose my right.

Mr. BLANTON. I just want to finish my remarks.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have no objection to yielding the floor.

Mr. CALDWELL. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BLANTON. I now move to strike out the paragraph, with the kind permission of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of a proper board of conciliation——

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BURKE. A point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE. Has not the gentleman from Illinois the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois yielded.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has been here a long time and he knows how to assert his rights; he runs the Republican Party here and he does not need the gentleman from Pennsylvania to help him out.

Mr. BURKE. The gentleman has already talked five minutes on the question.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking upon a new subject now. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] just left the Senate restaurant a few minutes ago, where he promised Mr. CARSS that he would be back and relieve him. They are taking shifts now, and one of them is supposed to watch the gentleman from Texas at all times to prevent him from discussing railroad matters.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I will do my country a good service, and I want to tell you the country is sick and tired of it. It is not to the best interest of the country for the gentleman to go along and arraign capital against labor, and there ought to be some stop put to it.

Mr. BLANTON. They may find a good job for the gentleman in Pittsburgh before long, where he will not have to watch the "gentleman from Texas" so assiduously.

As I was about to say when interrupted——

Mr. BURKE. A point of order——

Mr. BLANTON (continuing). I am in favor of a proper board of conciliation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state his point of order.

Mr. BURKE. He has again drawn me into this controversy, but I failed to hear——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order.

Mr. BURKE. Will the gentleman from Texas state it again?

Mr. BLANTON. I decline to yield. Now, I am recognized for five minutes, am I not, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of a proper board of conciliation. If you will put in the Department of Labor a board of conciliation that will not discriminate against the laborer who does not belong to a trade organization, I will vote to increase this appropriation from $100,000 to $1,000,000, if necessary. I will do it because it would be the best million dollars that was ever spent by a Congress of the United States. But as long as you have a board of conciliation which does as the several hundred complaints which are in my office files say they do—discriminate against the unorganized laborers of this land—I am not in favor of voting a cent for it.

One hundred thousand dollars here will be thrown away, provided they do discriminate. And I want to say that the evidence that I put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some time ago from the Philadelphia Public Ledger proved that conclusively. How long are you going to let this last? There are about 5,000,000 organized laborers in the United States, all told; there are about 30,000,000 laborers who are unorganized. Do you represent the 5,000,000 or the 30,000,000? I will tell you whom I represent. I represent not only the 30,000,000 who are unorganized but I also represent the 5,000,000 who are organized. Do you know I honestly believe that I am a better friend, a truer friend, of organized labor than the men who get up here and represent their special-class interests, because I am fighting here day after day to protect them against their own worst enemies—their radical leaders—who would lead them astray and who bring their organizations into disrepute and cause resentment from the public?

What is the chairman of this committee going to do about this? I am going to vote for this $100,000, although I moved to strike out the paragraph in the hope that the President has so shaken up this department down here by action taken recently, indicating that they must not do things without coming to him and first finding out what is the policy of this country. I am so in hopes that he will require this board of conciliation to represent the entire 35,000,000 laborers of this land alike, without discrimination, that I am going to vote for the $100,000.

But I want to call the attention of the chairman to the fact that we need legislation here now to protect all the laborers of the land from discrimination, and he ought to give it to us. Some committee, at least, ought to give it to us. We have got to get back to production. You can talk about the high cost of living, but, as was so well said not long ago, it is not so much the "high cost of living," but it is the "cost of high living" that we have got to deal with, and is causing so much trouble. Four dollars per diem here in lieu of subsistence and $12,000 to be spent in the District of this $100,000 appropriation, and a lot of that is the cost of high living and not the high cost of living. How much has the chairman considered that in making this appropriation? I know he has cut $100,000, but he has cut $100,000 off the war appropriation and not the peace-time appropriation. You have got to get back to normal conditions.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how serious the gentleman from Texas is in offering his motion to strike out the paragraph, but I assume that it is pro forma. I have learned through observation that legislation is a peculiar and odd thing. The other day we passed the railroad bill, providing, I believe, nine labor conciliators at a salary of $10,000 each. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is $90,000 in salaries to the commission, and there will be undoubtedly $90,000 or more necessary to pay the expenses of clerical help, and rent, and so forth, of the commission. And all they deal with is the railway labor, and in most cases that will be settled in large groups, and when settled will not be immediately open for reconsideration. Here is a proposition carrying only $100,000 to provide conciliators for all the rest of the business of the United States, intricate, involved, hundreds of thousands of different organizations on the one side and on the other side. And it seems to me that it would have been wiser—though I have no desire to criticize the Committee on Appropriations in their effort to reduce the expenditures of the Government, as I quite agree with them in general—it seems to me it would have been wiser instead of reducing this appropriation to have increased it.

Oh, gentlemen say the conciliators are not always of the right character. Very likely. I have seen Members of Congress elected by a constituency, and doubted whether they were of any value to the country. I have seen many Government employees who were not just the thing that I would select if I had the selection; but, after all, in this country of ours we have either got to come to one of two things—we are either going to try to bring harmony in labor disputes by conciliation between employer and employee, or perhaps some day we shall require compulsory arbitration, which I doubt. For myself I never have believed in compulsory arbitration as being beneficial either to capital or to labor. I think that it is wise for the Government to seek through a third person to bring together those who are disputing, labor on the one side and the employer on the other, and see if they will not agree. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] is recognized.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, in reply to what has been said by the Representative from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]—namely, that Congressman CARSS and myself have worked together and blocked him from the floor and from having his remarks extended in the RECORD—I want to say that in having done so I consider that we rendered a public service to the country. The people of the country have had a few days' rest, and I have had the pleasure and comfort of sitting here in peace for at least a few days free from the usual procedure of listening to his abusive and incorrect statements. I believe a good many of the Members of this Congress have also enjoyed the same feeling of peace and comfort.

I have stated before on this floor that this is not the place to air hostility and hatred to the working classes; it is not the place to array capital against labor or labor against capital. I have always been fair toward capital, and I want to be fair to everybody, but it is very unfair to me to have to sit here every day and listen to exaggerated and incorrect statements.

I have become disgusted with what goes on here in this respect, and so has the country. Day after day the Representative from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] prances up and down in front of us, shaking his fist in our faces, making incorrect statements to Congress, and villifying labor.

Mr. BLANTON just got through telling this Congress that organized labor meant the closed shop. There never was a more incorrect statement. For 32 years I have been connected with the Order of Railway Conductors, one of the best labor organizations in the United States, and the members of this organization and the members of the other railroad organizations do not discriminate against the men who do not belong to the organizations. The nonmembers receive all the benefits that the organizations' members receive in the way of wages and working conditions, although it is the organizations that make the contracts and agreements and establish better conditions for the men. Only this morning I came in on a train with a man who has been a Baltimore & Ohio conductor for 35 years. He is not a member of the Order of Railway Conductors, yet he enjoys the friendship and the liking of all his fellow workers. He receives the same benefits his fellow conductors receive through a conductors' wage schedule. He does not belong to the conductors' organization; he is not forced to belong to it. He is liked by his fellow conductors, and they work in peace and harmony. There are countless numbers of men who do not belong to organized labor who derive all the advantages and benefits of the organized workers' contract, which refutes the statement of the Representative from Texas—that men must belong, and if they do not they are discriminated against.

It is time these misstatements and this abuse was put a stop to. We can not have content in this country, we can not have stability in this country, as long as men stand up here day after day blackguarding and vilifying labor.

I want to say to my side of the House, too, that I have sat here watching some of you applauding Mr. BLANTON'S remarks, and possibly if he had not received encouragement the rest of us would not have had to constantly suffer listening to his abusive talk.

The working people read of what transpires here, the attacks that are made upon them, and the heart and the energy is taken out of them by the unfairness and the injustice of it. It is time that it was put a stop to. Labor does not have to take the abuse.

Members here will talk about a $60 a month salary for some poor laborer; will vote against a few dollars' increase for the poorly paid Government employees; burn up hour after hour in talking about it for two and three days at a time; but when it comes to a bill appropriating $300,000,000 of the people's money to finance the railroads, it goes through with only a five-hour debate allowed.

According to the press reports of the country, 17,000 millionaires were created during the period of war, which means $17,000,000,000 of private wealth garnered out of a nation's woe and a people's misery. Under the Lever Act, I am advised, Attorney General Palmer has full power to have the books of these newly made millionaire concerns audited and let the people of the country find out just how and in what manner they made the millions. As long as I have been in Congress, I have never once heard Mr. BLANTON raise his voice against the "big interests" of the country or say one word about bringing the profiteers to justice, but he spends his time talking against labor and abusing Mr. Gompers, whose life has been dedicated to the uplift of his fellow man and the cause of humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CASEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] has been recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I rise to a point of order, that the debate has been exhausted on the pro forma amendment offered by myself, and I ask leave to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his pro forma amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last two words.

[Mr. CASEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I object. I move, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I did not understand the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY].

The CHAIRMAN. He asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The question being taken, the motion was rejected.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer for a few moments to the statements made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] with reference to this being a proposition for a closed shop. That is a mistake. There is no reference at all to a closed shop.

Mr. BLANTON. I made no such inference. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. GARLAND. The gentleman's whole speech was on the closed shop.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I said the department should recognize the principle of the open shop.

Mr. GARLAND. But that meant, of course, that the shops were closed under this provision.

Mr. BLANTON. That meant that the Department of Labor——

Mr. GARLAND. I refuse to yield any further. This proposition means to apply to an open or closed shop. It means that anywhere, where differences arise between employers and employees, no matter where it is, differences which threaten the industry of the community, differences which threaten trouble, the Secretary of Labor may send this conciliation board, so that they may go there and try to find out the true status of affairs, and let it be known, and to advise against strikes. As many differences arise where there is no labor organization as anywhere else, differences between employer and employee. That frequently happens and will always be so. It does not encourage a closed shop at all, and it does not make any more open shops. It simply provides a plan of conciliation, and the Lord knows that they need something down in Texas in the gentleman's district. He stood up here one day and submitted a list of the wages paid in his district, which I would have been ashamed to show; a list of the wages paid clerks, bookkeepers, and others, running from $50 to $60 and $70 a month, to clerks in banks, doing the hardest kind of work, and the most scientific work that can be accomplished in that particular line, and they married men trying to support families. He named them all over his district, and said those men were satisfied. Now, everybody knows that men can not live honestly and decently on the wages that the gentleman said were proper wages to be paid. Why should they not have the right to complain? Why should there not be a conciliation board come in and state what is paid elsewhere for this same kind of work where the living costs are the same? I am in favor of returning the same appropriation for conciliation boards as last year.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Labor Statistics: Commissioner, $5,000; chief statistician, who shall also perform the duties of chief clerk, $3,000; statistician, $3,000; 6 statistical experts, at $2,000 each; employees—2 at $2,760 each, 1, $2,520, 5 at $2,280 each, 1, $1,800, 6 at $1,600 each, 7 at $1,400 each, 2 at $1,200 each; special agents—4 at $1,800 each, 6 at $1,600 each, 8 at $1,400 each, 4 at $1,200 each; clerks—8 of class 4, 7 of class 3, 10 of class 2, 17 of class 1, 8 at $1,000 each; 2 copyists; messenger; 3 assistant messengers; 2 laborers; in all, $172,960.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Gentlemen of the committee, I want to say, first of all, that I am in entire sympathy with the efforts being made here for economy, and therefore I undergo the embarrassment that every Member must suffer when he asks for consideration of any particular item in the bill.

This Bureau of Labor Statistics is under a very capable commissioner, who in the last year has been doing a very remarkable piece of work, I think, in gathering the data upon which to make certain recommendations, or to supply information to operate as a basis for the payment of the salaries and wages in various businesses.

I have a list of 30 different institutions employing labor that have in the last two months applied to this department for information on the cost of living, to serve as a basis for these different industries, as to whether they should increase the wages of their men or not. I asked the Commissioner of Labor Statistics if he would not cull out for me some of the letters received in January and February, and he kindly sent me some of the letters and copies of others. Let me run over some of them. Mark you, this is information sought as a basis for determining the cost of living in order to justify either the increasing or the withholding of increases of wages.

As a study from the standpoint of a university, there came a letter from the School of Commerce of the University of Michigan. There was a letter from the Manufacturers' Association of Connecticut; a letter from the committee on economic research of Harvard University; a letter from the Republican national committee to get at the facts as to the cost of living; a letter from the W. H. McElwain Co., makers of shoes, Manchester, N. H.; a letter from the United Typothetæ of America; a letter from the Northwestern University, which is making an extended research study of this question; a letter from the Scovill Manufacturing Co., of Waterbury, Conn.; a letter from the Survey Magazine; a letter from the North Dakota Agricultural College and Government Experiment Station at Fargo, N. Dak.; a letter from the Eagle-Pitcher Lead Co., of Chicago; a letter from Frederick J. Bliss, insurance appraiser, of Hartford, Conn.; a letter from Wills MacLachlan, electrical engineer, of Toronto, Canada; a letter from the Department of Labor and Industries of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; a letter from Hobbs & Sulphen, of Chicago; a letter from the Central Pennsylvania Lumber Co., of Williamsport, Pa.; a letter from the Vick Chemical Co., of Greensboro, N. C.; a letter from the Knickerbocker Press; a letter from the Procter & Gamble Co., of Cincinnati.

These are just a few of the great list that was sent to me at my request, in order that I might have specific information as to the interests making inquiries in the Department of Labor Statistics. And when we realize that this is to get information upon which you can base action with reference to meeting the high cost of living, it becomes immediately of supreme importance.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. What was the purpose of these letters and what was the request that the writers made?

Mr. FESS. The request was as to the cost of articles of necessity in order to make a survey of the cost of living.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take the time of the committee unduly. The appropriation carried in the paragraph reduces heavily what was asked, and even reduces what we had last year. I have asked for the minimum requirement and it has been stated to me that 22 clerks will be cut off, including 2 statisticians at $3,000 each, 1 employee at $2,520, 2 at $2,280 each, 4 at $2,000 each, a special agent, and so on to the number of 22, a reduction of $44,180. I am told that these must be dropped and that this service can not be continued. I think it is rather unfortunate that it becomes necessary to do that. I say it understandingly, with a very kind appreciation of the desire to economize, and I am going to vote for every economy I think we can stand. I am a little distressed about this. In other words, I think it is not a good step to reduce our ability to get information that we ought to have to meet problems that are facing us.

Mr. CASEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. CASEY. I am curious to know in the event that we may not get this valuable information from the Bureau of Statistics where are employers to get it?

Mr. FESS. They can not get it unless they find some other source, and I know of no other available source from which they could make such a survey.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing a memorandum of the survey in the cost of living made by this bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS,
Washington.

MEMORANDUM.

The information on prices, both wholesale and retail, and cost of living gathered by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics is being used in the adjustment of labor disputes and in wage agreements throughout the whole country. Unfortunately, I have kept no record of the number of individual firms which have written in to the bureau stating that they had established or wished to establish a sliding scale wage payment in conformity with the changes in the cost of living or changes as shown by our retail food price index number. It would mean a very laborious search in our files to find any considerable percentage of the large number of employers and organizations which are making use regularly of these figures. I inclose a partial list of those making use of our price or cost of living indexes.

I have no means of guessing how many employees these firms have, and it would be of very little value if I could supply that number, because it does not at all indicate the extent to which our monthly retail price statistics are being used in wage adjustments.

Of much greater importance in settling wage disputes than either the wholesale or retail price statistics issued monthly by the Bureau of Labor Statistics have been the periodical cost of living compilations which have been put out at irregular intervals during the last year and a half. It has been my intention to establish on a permanent basis the index number of changes in the cost of living, showing such indexes regularly twice a year for the months of November–December and June–July. This would give invaluable information to employers and employees everywhere. It would be especially unfortunate if the appropriations of the Bureau of Labor Statistics are cut so as to make it impossible to continue the regular publication of the cost of living index. Even for the short period during which I have published cost of living indexes they have been used in arriving at wage adjustments in practically all important labor disputes in the country. Beginning with the Shipbuilding Wage Adjustment Board of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, United States Shipping Board, wage agreements were made in all shipyards of the country based upon the data furnished by this bureau. The number of workers involved would be several hundred thousand, although I can not give the numbers accurately. The National War Labor Board made its wage adjustments on the basis of the same figures. Again the number of workers involved can not be given accurately, but the principle of adjusting wages in this way has been recognized in the street railway industry, in machine shops and factories, in pulp and paper manufacture, and in practically all other industries over which the National War Labor Board exercised any jurisdiction.

The Federal Railway Administration at first made a special investigation of its own into the cost of living. In this investigation, however, it made use of the wholesale and retail price statistics compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Later on the railway wage-adjustment boards used both the wholesale and retail prices and the cost of living indexes compiled by this bureau in making wage adjustments. The number of men affected by these wage adjustments would be in the neighborhood of 1,000,000.

When the Fuel Administration was confronted by the necessity of reopening the wage question in the anthracite mining industry, Fuel Administrator Garfield called upon the Bureau of Labor Statistics to make a hurried investigation into wages, hours, and earnings in anthracite mines and cost of living in anthracite mining centers. The data collected in this investigation were used in arriving at a new wage agreement. The bituminous miners next claimed an advance in wages, and the Bureau of Labor Statistics was called upon to make a similar investigation into wages, hours, earnings, and cost of living in the bituminous mining industry. As a result of the findings of the bureau no wage increase was granted to the bituminous miners by the Fuel Administrator at that time.

In the present controversy over miners' wages the Bureau of Labor Statistics has again been called upon to furnish all available information as to wages, hours, and earnings, and has been requested to make another study of cost of living in bituminous mining centers. This study has just been completed in 8 of the more important bituminous mining towns. The number of employees in both anthracite and bituminous mining affected by the wage agreements based upon wage and cost of living data furnished by the Bureau of Labor Statistics is not far from 800,000.

Other governmental wage adjustment boards and industrial relations services have made use of the statistics on wages, prices, and cost of living issued by the bureau either as a part of its regular work or as the result of special studies made at the behest of the President or some governmental agency.

While, of course, it can not be maintained that cost of living studies are the be-all and end-all for the solution of industrial unrest, it must be acknowledged that such studies are absolutely indispensable, especially in these times of readjustment and reconstruction of the industrial fabric. I do not hold that the principle of wage adjustment upon the basis of changes in the cost of living is the sole principle which should be taken into account in making wage agreements. I think, however, it must be acknowledged by all that it is a highly important element which can not be ignored if amicable relations are to be restored and maintained in industry. The Bureau of Labor Statistics is the agency which is best fitted to make such studies, because it has already made such studies which are accepted without question by practically all employers and employees. These studies should be regularized so that industry could look forward with certainty to the regular appearance of the cost of living index for the winter season, November–December, and the summer season, June–July.

Of course, it is utterly impossible for the Federal Government to make special investigations and furnish special statistics as to changes in cost of living for each particular industry for special localities over any period of time that may happen to be selected by the employers or employees. All that can be expected of the Federal Government is to furnish cost of living data at regular intervals, say, twice a year, for the more important industrial centers. Cost of living varies but little from industry to industry. Changes in cost of living vary but little from community to community, although the level of the cost of living is quite different in a large city as compared with a small town. Special industries and particular localities will necessarily have to make special investigations to adapt the figures furnished by the Federal Government to their particular circumstances. I can comply with only a small fractional part of the demands from individual industries, employers, and localities to make cost of living surveys applying to their particular problems.

If Congress reduces the appropriation of the Bureau of Labor Statistics as is proposed, cutting off $78,430 from the amount on which the bureau operated in the fiscal year 1920, which is a cut of $54,180 from the regular appropriation of this current fiscal year, it will be impossible for the Bureau of Labor Statistics to continue the cost of living surveys, much less to expand this work, as is so insistently demanded by employers throughout the country.

ROYAL MEEKER,
Commissioner of Labor Statistics.

FEBRUARY 28, 1920.

The Clerk read as follows:

For per diem in lieu of subsistence of special agents, and employees, and for their transportation; experts and temporary assistance for field service outside of the District of Columbia, to be paid at the rate of not exceeding $8 per day; temporary statistical clerks, stenographers, and typewriters in the District of Columbia, to be selected from civil-service registers and to be paid at the rate of not exceeding $100 per month, the same person to be employed for not more than six consecutive months, the total expenditure for such temporary clerical assistance in the District of Columbia not to exceed $6,000; traveling expenses of officers and employees, purchase of reports and materials for reports and bulletins of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and for subvention to "International Association for Labor Legislation," and necessary expenses connected with representation of the United States Government therein, $70,000.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 145, line 4, the figures "$70,000" and insert the figures "$80,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 145, line 4, strike out the figures "$70,000" and insert "$80,000."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], with the general purpose of the subcommittee I am in complete sympathy. I venture to suggest this change solely because of the fact that the war brought one new requirement to meet which the Bureau of Statistics is the only bureau of the Government available. I refer to the new necessity of having at command regular computations of the cost of living as a basis for wage determination. For example, in the railroad bill just passed there is a requirement that the cost of living shall be taken into account in the fixing of wages.

A very interesting experiment is being tried by not a few employers who are automatically adjusting the wage scale to the fluctuations in the index numbers as they are reported from time to time by this bureau. While the cost of living should not be the only element in determining wages, it is at the present time a most vital element. The possibility of the extension of this system, by which wages shall not only go up but when the impending drop comes, if they have risen, shall go down in exact correspondence with prices, may not have been brought emphatically to the attention of the committee. While I wish it had been possible in the paragraph discussed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] to have retained the number of employees who were at work during the last year, I would not press that point. But I hope the committee may be willing that the figure for this lump-sum expenditure shall remain as it was last year, without the dropping of $10,000, a cut that will seriously hamper the bureau in making these regular reports, month by month, of the change in the index numbers.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that every gentleman who speaks in opposition to any reduction made by this committee says that he himself is in entire accord with the desire of the committee to retrench expenditures, but finds a very convenient reason why that particular item should be raised. That same excuse has been offered every time an attempt of that character has been made, and it could with equal consistency be made with reference to every item in the bill.

Now, when are we to get away from these exorbitant expenditures to defray the expenses of the Government? We will not do it if we are going to yield to individual requests. It was by the reduction of individual items that we were enabled to cut out $18,000,000, and we are constantly meeting individual attempts on the floor of the House to put it all back again. We might with equal consistency offer for every item that has been reduced an argument looking to an increase of every one of the items without exception.

I wish again to call the attention of the committee to the fact that these bureaus, many of them created during the war, for war emergency purposes, are now not only trying to make themselves permanent but are endeavoring to convince Congress that they should have an increase in force compared with what they had during the war.

If we proceed in this manner we are going to take from the field and the farm the men who should be there engaged in production, and find them employment in this constantly increasing army of the civil service in Washington, already increased from 37,000 before the war to 102,000 to-day. If these excuses continue to come, this army of civil employees that we now have will increase rather than diminish. I do not think there is any reason why this or any other item should be raised.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the general question of economy, and especially in the matter of compulsory military training.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on economy in connection with compulsory military training. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will this be in favor of compulsory military training?

Mr. MASON. No.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The requirement in section 4 of the act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat., p. 596), for filing a certificate from the Department of Labor with the clerk of the court at the time of filing a petition for naturalization is hereby repealed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the words in line 26, page 145, and lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, on page 146.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I reserve the point of order for the present.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman and of the committee to this language. It was inserted at the request of the chief of the bureau, who presented facts to the committee which were convincing that it not only would save time but would save money and would prove efficient. I understand that the objection to it upon the part of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] is that it is one of the checks they have upon the admission of undesirables to the United States. It is not the desire of this committee or anyone in the Congress, I understand, to take away any possible check upon that proposition, and I do not believe that this has anything to do with that. For instance, if an immigrant comes to this country under some assumed name and then applies for citizenship papers and an investigation is had through the port where he lands and they never find any such person as that there, this requirement sought to be eliminated would be of no use so far as identity is concerned.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. This is clearly new legislation.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is. There is no question but that is subject to the point of order. It is a question of whether it is a well-raised point or not. In my opinion, under the process now of taking out citizenship papers it does not add to or detract from the desirability of the applicant. It makes a little bit more work for those engaged in the naturalization work and subjects a number of our citizens to a great deal of inconvenience and is no check so far as desirability or undesirability is concerned. This amendment is for the purpose of expediting the work of the department, saving expense there, and also the work of those in charge of the naturalization bureau.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph in my opinion shows the danger of putting legislation on appropriation bills. It happens that the Committee on Naturalization and Immigration has a bill on the calendar, H. R. 10404, and the very first paragraph of that bill is a provision canceling this steamship certificate. This committee put that paragraph into its omnibus naturalization bill upon the statements exactly the same as those made to the Committee on Appropriations, by the same gentleman, as plausible as you please. I am not prepared to say at this moment that this change should not be done, but after the bill was placed on the calendar the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization was given authority to make some investigations. On returning from a minor inquiry we reopened our bill and the first flaw we found in it was with regard to these steamship certificates, and thereupon the Committee on Naturalization and Immigration appointed a special committee to make a special inquiry, and that subcommittee is now at work. We went into this same question and have testimony in our hearings, four or five or six pages, advocating this change, the testimony all being from one man. Then a little later on we obtained supplemental evidence from the same gentleman. The question is now an open one in the committee and the committee is now considering it. Of course a Committee on Appropriations can "short-shoot the turn" and do the work of all the other committees of the House. I wish to quote from the testimony before our committee:

Mr. JOHNSON. In case you can not prove arrival on shipboard, how do you get around it and give the man his citizenship?

Mr. CRIST. In those cases we send him to the immigration authorities and they examine him and from this record show a nunc pro tunc certificate of arrival.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that in violation of the law?

Mr. CRIST. No; it is not in violation of law, for court decisions sanction it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it an evasion of the law?

Mr. CRIST. It is substituting a paper record upon which to issue the form which will allow the alien to admission to citizenship.

A little further on I quote some further testimony:

Mr. JOHNSON. What do you mean by paper record?

Mr. CRIST. A man comes in by way of New York and is examined 10 years later in Omaha; on the record of the immigration authorities the certificate of arrival is issued.

Mr. JOHNSON. On guess?

Mr. CRIST. On his own statement.

Mr. JOHNSON. If he says he came on the Cambria and the records fail to prove that he did, you finally take his word for it?

Mr. CRIST. We must take his word in any event.

It will therefore be seen that in spite of the law they have developed a plan by which the man's word is taken. He may have come across the border——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is the fault of the enforcement of the law. They are doing that in violation of the law, because under the law, when challenged, he must make proof of his identity by substantial evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right also to object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A further question was asked by the chairman of the committee:

I want to know how many cases you can pick up to be naturalized if you are relieved of the record of the steamship arrival.

Mr. Crist replies to that:

Every alien who came into the United States after June 29, 1906, must give their evidence, and if this law is repealed not one will have to get a certificate of arrival.

The reason that I shall make the point is that your Committee on Naturalization and Immigration thinks that the steamship certificate is of some value and has been quite a decided check, and before striking it out of the law we want to put something into the law in its place that is better, if possible. The point of order, of course, is that this paragraph is new legislation, and, further, that it does not come under the provisions of the Holman rule.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will state to the committee that the only purpose that we had in taking the action that we did was for the purpose of saving some money, and upon the assurance that this present requirement was no check and that the steamship certificate was worthless so far as identity was concerned. It was of no value in the matter of establishing citizenship; in other words, that it retarded the expedition of the proceedings.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will yield.

Mr. RAKER. In addition to the statement made, the law requires each one of these parties to have a certificate when they enter the United States whether on steamship or on land from the Canadian or the Mexican side.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That certificate does not prove anything.

Mr. RAKER. It proves this: It proves that he entered a port and is legally in the United States. Without the certificate he is illegally here and should be deported, and the certificate has that value for three years and it establishes the fact that he retained the certificate and never abandoned it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order against the paragraph, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There are no last words.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph has gone out.

Mr. SIEGEL. But the Bureau of Naturalization, providing for a commissioner at $4,000——

The CHAIRMAN. That has been passed. The Clerk will read and the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PLATT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. Richmond, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 12160. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River at a point a little east of north of Nocona in Montague County, Tex.; and

H. R. 11756. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Connecticut River between Springfield and West Springfield, in Hampden County, Mass.

The message also announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9065) to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 12, 20, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon and had appointed Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. GRONNA, and Mr. OWEN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12046) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior years, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Children's Bureau: Chief, $5,000; assistant chief, $2,400; experts—one on sanitation $2,800, industrial $2,000, social service $2,000, statistical $2,000; administrative clerk, $2,000; editor, $2,000; special agents—1 $1,800, 4 at $1,600 each, 10 at $1,400 each, 12 at $1,200 each; private secretary to chief of bureau, $1,500; clerks—2 of class 4, 4 of class 3, 4 of class 2, 17 of class 1, 10 at $1,000 each; copyist; messenger; in all, $106,040.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be so much confusion in regard to the process of naturalization and the requirements of section 4 of the naturalization law, to which reference was made a moment ago, that I thought I might explain the procedure. When an alien arrives in America, within 30 days thereafter he may make application for what is known as a declaration of intention to become a citizen. When he has been here five years, and at least 90 days before his petition for final citizenship can be heard, he must file his petition. He goes to the clerk of the court with two witnesses, and they must testify to the fact that they have known him during the entire five-year period of time. Then the papers are sent over to the bureau of examiners of the Naturalization Bureau. There the examiners question the witnesses and examine the applicant again. At the Department of Justice and the Office of Military Intelligence there is a record of cases which may have arisen as a result of the draft, and so forth, showing the loyalty of the witnesses or the general actions of the applicant. When that has been disposed of and the naturalization examiners are thoroughly satisfied that the man is fit to become an American citizen, he and his two witnesses must appear before the court. Now, it is true that appearance before the court on the final proof is a formal affair. It is assumed if the naturalization examiners have O. K'd these papers for the applicant, then the applicant is admitted. It is true the witnesses and the applicant are sworn in the court, but that is about all it consists of. In regard to the certificate of arrival, as to which reference was made a few moments ago, it is a well-known fact that thousands of men in the United States will never be able to obtain that certificate of arrival, as the records at Ellis Island were burned some time ago. In addition to that, it is a well-known fact that the steamship companies in filing their manifest, where the name might be "Wack," show it probably as "Vack," and so on. In numerous cases it is impossible to obtain from the manifest list the name of the individual who arrived here For years the courts have held that where such certificates can not be obtained, evidence furnished by the man himself that he has been in the country five years, together with that of his witnesses, was competent and sufficient. Now, as a matter of fact, years ago there used to be handed out to the immigrant when he arrived here a certificate or a slip from the steamship company showing that he had arrived by steamer so-and-so.

When we were on board the Adriatic—when I say "we" I mean members of the Immigration Committee—we found first and second class passengers who received cards of landing and pitched them away. This certificate of arrival does not add a single iota of measure of safety in permitting any man to be admitted to citizenship. It does result in this, however, that over 22,000 applications for certificates are unattended to at Ellis Island at the present time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But 20,000 of those have been cleaned up during the month of February, showing the bureau can get busy if it tried to do so.

Mr. SIEGEL. The Naturalization Bureau does not have to do that particular work. It is supposed to be done by the Immigration Service. It is separate and distinct from the Naturalization Bureau. The naturalization work is held back, impeded, and retarded by the failure of the inspectors and others in the Immigration Service at Ellis Island doing this work. That work at Ellis Island is never done, except when they have leisure time to do it. We all know who have given any attention to the proposition that the Immigration Service has its own method of handling its own business and the Naturalization Bureau has its own method.

And if it is necessary to continue this certificate-of-arrival proposition, the Naturalization Bureau should have their own inspectors in order to do it. It is useless to constantly cry that aliens do not desire to become citizens, when instead of providing sufficient machinery for that purpose you are placing cogs in the wheel. It is about time that the country learned the facts and placed the responsibility where it properly belongs. Provide the courts and examiners and your problem of Americanization will be quickly solved and help make America really American.

The Clerk read as follows:

To investigate and report upon matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and especially to investigate the questions of infant mortality, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $80,000: Provided, That not exceeding eight persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation of $2,000 each per annum and above that sum.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman if this does not involve a duplication of some of the work of the Public Health Service, this investigation of infant mortality and conditions of that kind? Does not that properly belong to the Public Health Department?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It does perhaps result in some little duplication, but it is a work the prime purpose of which is distinctly pertaining to the investigation that has been made through the Department of Labor. And we asked those who are interested in this service with reference to the amount of duplication, and they said there was very little of it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is this confined to children of the immigrants and of the people who have recently come to this country, or is it a general proposition?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is a general proposition. They send their agents into the homes, and they ascertain the conditions by visitation, and then they try to do the work through other kinds of influences, such as the school-teacher or some other friend. There is nothing compulsory about the acts of this department. They gather the information through visitation, and sometimes by suggestions to the mother with reference to the care of her children conditions are bettered, and I think it a very good work.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Has it been conducted some time by the bureau or is it a recent line of work?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It has been conducted for some time, and it has been very satisfactory.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rent: For rent of buildings and parts of buildings in the District of Columbia for the use of the Department of Labor, $24,000.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question as to this rent item. Is there not room for this department in some of the buildings owned by the Government?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. This is a leased building. It was a building that was erected for the Department of Labor, and a very peculiar question arose concerning it. It seems that through the mistake of the architect they built one story more onto this building than was required by that department of the Government. They had a lease upon the whole building, and now that we are occupying the whole building under the lease they are insisting we shall pay them for the extra story. We have not seen our way clear to do it. But this is a building that was erected especially for this department, and it is on a long-term lease. I do not know whether there is a place to house them outside of that building or not.

Mr. TILSON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

JUDICIAL.

Supreme Court: Chief Justice, $15,000; 8 associate justices, at $14,500 each; marshal, $4,500; 9 stenographic clerks, 1 for the Chief Justice and 1 for each associate justice, at not exceeding $2,000 each; 9 law clerks, 1 for the Chief Justice and 1 for each associate justice, at not exceeding $3,600 each; in all, $185,900.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph for the purpose of making a point of order on the language beginning with the last word on line 21, as follows:

Nine law clerks, 1 for the Chief Justice and 1 for each associate justice, at not exceeding $3,600 each.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the chairman concede that it is subject to a point of order?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; I concede that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think it is.

Mr. SISSON. There is no authority of law. I am not making it on the whole paragraph. I am simply confining it to the law clerks.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, there are a great many places in this bill providing for law clerks for which there never was any authorization of law except the appropriation act of the current year. There are a great many places in this bill providing for all character of clerks in the departments that never were authorized by law except as provided in the current appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that this is not carried in the current law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand, and if it were it probably would not make any difference. There was an act some years ago, but I do not know whether it covers the current appropriation act or not, that provided that where an item was carried in an appropriation bill for a position it should be considered that that position as a matter of law existed and the salary existed. But we make constant provision in every department for more clerks than there were before. I do not know, but it may be that this is subject to a point of order. It seems to me where the Constitution creates a Supreme Court it is in order to provide money for its maintenance and support, more than merely the salary of the judges or the officers named by the court. Of course, if the Chair has looked up this matter——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not. He has been simply informed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] that he conceded the point of order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Indiana is an able parliamentarian, an able legislator, and an able appropriation man, but what any man in charge of a bill does not know about points of order would fill many volumes compared with what he does know. That was exemplified by what took place here yesterday, where the gentleman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], a few years ago readily conceded a point of order and the Chair naturally and properly followed him and sustained the point of order, and the Chair yesterday sustained the point of order following the decision of the Chair before, based upon the concession of a man in charge of the bill who did not know anything about the point of order and admitted yesterday that he was mistaken before, which frequently happens.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Of course, I will accede to the superiority of the gentleman from Illinois on all parliamentary information. Has he any authority that he can offer to show that this is in order?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman did not listen to what I said.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no question about there being no law to provide for it in this bill. It is in another bill and not this one. It is on a deficiency bill and not on this legislative bill, because this committee has for a number of years decided this. There is no question about its not being authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think, in the absence of a specific law on this subject, that these clerks are authorized, and therefore sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Books and judicial officers: For purchase and rebinding of law books, including the exchange thereof, for United States judges, district attorneys, and other judicial officers, including the nine libraries of the United States circuit courts of appeals, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General: Provided, That such books shall in all cases be transmitted to their successors in office; all books purchased thereunder to be marked plainly, "The property of the United States," $16,000, of which not to exceed 10 per cent, in the discretion of the Attorney General, may be used for the purchase of United States Reports and the Federal Reporter.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I do so in order that I may ask the chairman of the subcommittee if, in his judgment, this paragraph puts enough information at the command of the Attorney General and the district attorneys?

I find that on the 23d of February the Attorney General, speaking at Topeka, Kans., according to the Topeka Capital, discussed the cost of living and devoted nearly one-half of his speech to an attack on Congress because "its mind, like Secretary Lansing's, had not gone willingly along with mine." [Laughter.]

I also find that in his annual report, when we had put at his command the additional money and the additional law he wanted with which to proceed against profiteering and hoarding, he stated: "It is now possible to deal vigorously with all classes of profiteering." We gave him all the money he wanted, and we gave him all the law he wanted, and he now castigates Congress. So, I wondered if we would not wisely help the district attorneys throughout the country if we bought twice as many books, and then if we might not double the appropriation for the detection and prosecution of crime, adding another million to the extra million we gave Mr. Palmer, in order that he may produce some still more tangible effect in reducing the cost of living. And I would like to call to his attention what Bradstreet's for February 14 said about the index numbers that mark the fluctuations in prices:

The February 1 number, it might be noted, marks a gain of 18.3 per cent over February 1 a year ago, when the reaction following the armistice was in full swing, and is 4.3 per cent above the high point touched on August 1, 1919, which saw the beginning of the acute anti-high-price agitation and the going to work of much noisy official machinery for the discouragement of high prices set up at Washington.

I fear, perhaps, that this reference to "much noisy official machinery" may be deemed an instance of lese majeste.

May I inquire if, with the scanty funds and the few books at the command of the Department of Justice, its officials were able to raise the cost of living 4 per cent and more in six months and 2.4 per cent in the month of January alone, how much more castigation Congress needs in order to put at the command of the Attorney General additional resources with which still further to raise the level of prices? [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman that the attention of each head of bureau was called to the proclamation issued by the Attorney General of the United States for the purpose of reducing the cost of living, and invariably the answer came from these bureaus that they did not think that Mr. Palmer could reduce the high cost of living by proclamation. He has taken no other steps for the purpose of reducing it, according to the knowledge of the committee; but for fear he may not have the full means with which to pursue the profiteers and reduce the cost of living, as he promised to do, we thought we had better not diminish the appropriation for the present session at least. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUCE. If the committee is not disposed to recommend more funds to assist the Attorney General in further elevating the cost of living, I will withdraw my amendment. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

All purchases of typewriting machines during the fiscal year 1921 by the various branches of the Government of the United States for use in the District of Columbia or in the field, except as hereinafter provided, shall be made from the surplus machines in the stock of the general supply committee. The War Department shall furnish the general supply committee, immediately upon the approval of this act, a complete inventory of the various makes, models, and classes of typewriters in its possession, the condition of such machines, and the point of storage, and shall turn over to the general supply committee such typewriting machines in such quantities as the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time may call for by specific requisition for sale to the various services of the Government. If the general supply committee is unable to furnish serviceable machines to any branch of the Government, it shall furnish unserviceable machines at current exchange prices and such machines shall then be applied by the branch of the Government receiving them as part payment for new machines from commercial sources in accordance with the prices fixed in the preceding paragraph. No new typewriting machine, however, shall be so purchased if it is of a different make than the machine given in exchange.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I notice this paragraph provides that if the general supply committee can not furnish serviceable machines, they shall furnish old machines to be used in exchange for the purchase of new machines, and then this provision is inserted:

No new typewriting machine, however, shall be so purchased if it is of a different make than the machine given in exchange.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the point of order is not raised, it is the purpose of the committee to move to strike out the language that the gentleman has just called attention to.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is satisfactory. I think that language would hold the Government up.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It would prevent competition.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 154, strike out the remainder of the section after the word "paragraph," in line 14, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"After the approval of this act and until June 30, 1921, the War Department shall not dispose of any typewriting machines except to the general supply committee authorized herein."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That all civilian employees of the Governments of the United States and the District of Columbia who receive a total of compensation at the rate of $2,500 per annum or less, except as otherwise provided in this section, shall receive, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, additional compensation at the rate of $240 per annum: Provided, That such employees as receive a total of annual compensation at a rate more than $2,500 and less than $2,740 shall receive additional compensation at such a rate per annum as may be necessary to make their salaries, plus their additional compensation, at the rate of $2,740 per annum, and no employee shall receive additional compensation under this section at a rate which is more than 60 per cent of the rate of the total annual compensation received by such employee: Provided further, That the increased compensation at the rate of $240 per annum for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, shall not be computed as salary in construing this section: Provided further, That where an employee in the service on June 30, 1919, has received during the fiscal year 1920, or shall receive during the fiscal year 1921, an increase of salary at a rate in excess of $200 per annum, or where an employee, whether previously in the service or not, has entered the service since June 30, 1919, whether such employee has received an increase in salary or not, such employees shall be granted the increased compensation provided herein only when and upon the certification of the person in the legislative branch or the head of the department or establishment employing such persons of the ability and qualifications personal to such employees as would justify such increased compensation: Provided further, That the increased compensation provided in this section to employees whose pay is adjusted from time to time through wage boards or similar authority shall be taken into consideration by such wage boards or similar authority in adjusting the pay of such employees.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order against this paragraph that it is new legislation, unauthorized by law, on an appropriation bill. I will state that this is the bonus section which was provided for temporarily during the war. The law providing for this bonus first of $120, then of $240, was passed merely as an emergency. to assist our employees during the war. It was understood then that when the war was over and we got back to normal conditions this should be taken off of their pay. If proper consideration——

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment. If proper consideration had been given our soldier and sailor boys who fought and served in the war, with reference to a proper bonus, I would not have made this point of order; but until we do justice to the soldier and sailor boys of this country who won the war in France, I do not think civilian employees should draw a war bonus.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to his point of order.

Mr. BAER. I agree with the gentleman as to the soldiers, but the gentleman said "when we get back to normal conditions." Does the gentleman consider that we have got back to normal conditions yet?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, we are certainly at peace. We are not at war.

Mr. BAER. Oh, yes; we are at war.

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not confining himself to his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I am confining myself to the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I am trying to answer the question propounded to me by the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. WALSH. That has nothing to do with the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that this legislation, or legislation like it, has been carried in the bill for the last three sessions of Congress. I will not contend that it is not subject to a point of order, but I had hoped that there might be some agreement or understanding here with reference to this bonus and that the point of order would not be made.

Mr. BLANTON. I think we can get some working agreement, if the gentleman will permit me to make a statement. I understand that there is to be an effort made here to increase this bonus from $240 to $480, which would be unconscionable. That is why I have raised this point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know whether there is any such arrangement.

Mr. BLANTON. If I did not make this point of order at this time, it would make this paragraph subject to that amendment, and certainly the chairman does not want a $480 bonus put in this bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman that he reserve his point of order, so as to allow the matter to be debated.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Why does not the gentleman reserve the point of order until we can arrive at some understanding?

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order? If not, the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The provisions of this section shall not apply to the following: Employees paid from the postal revenues and sums which may be advanced from the Treasury to meet deficiencies in the postal revenues.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. It will save the reading——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has not completed the reading of the paragraph.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing is in order until the reading of the paragraph is concluded.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman. The Clerk will conclude the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

Employees of the Panama Canal on the Canal Zone; employees of the Alaskan Engineering Commission in Alaska; officers and members of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia and the United States Park police who receive the compensation fixed by the act approved December 5, 1919.

Mr. BLANTON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia who receive the compensation fixed by the act approved January 24, 1920; employees paid from lump-sum appropriations in bureaus, divisions, commissions, or any other governmental agencies or employments created by law since January 1, 1916——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. We have not got a quorum here. I presume the Chair will conduct this body according to the law and the regulations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. I am forced to do so in order to get some action by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is out of order. The Chair will count.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Texas is liable to get censured by the House for such remarks. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I presume I have the right to make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will be in order. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON (during the count). I withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN (after completing the count). One hundred and twenty-seven Members present, a quorum.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to strike out the remainder of section 6.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Without reading it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the remainder of section 6 without reading it. It all relates to this same bonus proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to strike out, without completing the reading of the paragraph, all the remainder of section 6, down to section 7. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That hereafter the statement of buildings rented within the District of Columbia for the use of the Government, required by the act of July 16, 1892, shall indicate, in addition to the data required by section 2 of the act of May 1, 1913, the cost of the care, maintenance, and operation of each building per square foot of floor space of the building or portion of building rented.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the section. Will the gentleman be good enough to explain what the necessity is for this additional legislation?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What we are endeavoring to do is to find out what it is costing the Government for the buildings now rented by the Government. We felt that there ought to be some way whereby Congress can find out how much we are paying for rented buildings and for what purpose they are being used. It became very evident during the course of the investigation that with a little bit of care a great many of the Government activities now in rented quarters could be housed in the Government-owned buildings. We are getting this information now to some extent in the appendix of the estimates for appropriations.

Mr. GARRETT. I notice that it is provided that there shall be a report as to the maintenance and operation of each building and the number of square feet of floor space. Is that a fair test—to take it by the square foot?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is one of the tests; it is the basis on which they fix the rent.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 159, line 25, strike out the figure "2" and insert the figure "3."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, does not the chairman think it possible before the bill is disposed of that an application can be made to the Rules Committee for a rule making section 6 in order so that the matter can be properly disposed of? These employees can not go through the whole year without the necessary money for them to live on.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say that the committee does not think it advisable to ask for a rule. The committee is of the opinion that this should have been continued at $240, and that it would be unfair to continue it at a higher rate. I think that at some time between now and the time the bill becomes a law we can come to some conclusion with reference to it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is another body where they are not quite so technical in the construction of the rules.

Mr. CALDWELL. The chairman of the committee and the boss of the Republican side think that the other body can safely be trusted to put this provision back into the bill?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think so, although I am not the boss of the Republican side of the House.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman disclaims being the boss, but we all know who is the boss.

Mr. NOLAN. When the Democrats were in control of the House this went out on a point of order, and the Democrats brought in a rule protecting it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And I forced them to do it.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is all right; why do you not force the Republicans? You boss them.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think we will have the Republicans do it in another body.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an article headed "Clerks index Congressmen." It is a statement in reference to the question of voting. I want to show the attitude the clerks occupy toward gentlemen who do not agree to the increase of wages.

Mr. WALSH. By whom is the statement made?

Mr. SISSON. It appears in one of the Washington papers and is credited to the National Federation of Employees. I do not, of course, know that it is authentic, but it has not been denied and purports to be a statement from the Federation of Employees. I think it ought to go into the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Does it appear in the hearings?

Mr. SISSON. No; it does not.

Mr. WALSH. Why should it appear in the RECORD since the section has gone out on a point of order?

Mr. SISSON. It came out on February 19, and I think the RECORD ought to show it.

Mr. WALSH. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the article referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That after June 30, 1920, unless otherwise expressly provided by law, no allowance or reimbursement for subsistence other than expenses actually incurred for meals and lodgings while traveling on duty or actually engaged in the discharge of official duties away from his regular post of duty shall be paid to any officer or employee in any branch of the public service of the United States nor shall any sum be allowed or paid for such expenses actually incurred for meals and lodgings in excess of $5 per day and the expenses, for which payment or reimbursement is authorized herein, shall not be construed to include any gratuity or tip: Provided, That a per diem in lieu of subsistence may be allowed as heretofore when authorized by or pursuant to law.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the section.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California makes the point of order. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to cite any law authorizing this paragraph?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the Chair that the purpose of this section is to retrench expenditures. Its purpose is to prevent abuses and a wasteful expenditure of the public money, as evidenced by testimony appearing before the committee, from a detailed statement of reports made by different gentlemen who were traveling at the expense of the Government. This is inserted at the suggestion of the comptroller, who brought to the attention of the committee that there are a half dozen different ways whereby they arrive at different expenses in the various departments, and that there was necessity for some uniform rule whereby a limitation can be put upon these expenditures. That is the purpose of the legislation. There is a law authorizing subsistence, and there is also a law authorizing a per diem charge, $4, and $5 where receipts are taken and statements made of the expenditures.

For the purpose of curtailing expenses this provision, in the opinion of the comptroller, is necessary. I think it comes within the rule and is a limitation on expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to read in my time the article which I endeavored to have inserted a few moments ago. It is as follows:

CLERKS INDEX CONGRESSMEN—TABULATE SENTIMENT OF LAWMAKERS ON QUESTIONS AFFECTING SALARY.

All employees in the Government service, whether they live in Washington or San Francisco, will soon know just who are their friends or enemies in Congress, and they will be strongly urged to vote accordingly at the coming elections.

The National Federation of Federal Employees, in its headquarters at 1423 New York Avenue, is busily engaged at present card indexing every Representative in the Capitol as an important part of the voters' information bureau which has been established by the federation.

The sentiment of Congressmen on the legislative program of the Federal Employees' Union has been carefully followed, and every vote cast for or against measures of concern to Federal employees has been tabulated.

SIMILAR TO AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR PLAN.

The union legislative program, including such issues as minimum wage, retirement, and numerous other measures, together with the attitude of each Congressman toward the program, is being prepared to send broadcast to the headquarters of the locals throughout the United States.

The system being followed by the national federation is similar to that of the American Federation of Labor in keeping tab on officials' attitude toward labor.

The employees' union will not only keep its membership of nearly 100,000 informed, but will disseminate as well its voting information to every employee in the Government service.

WATCH NEW CANDIDATES.

While present Congressmen will be the principal subject of such a list, new candidates for the office will not be overlooked. It is planned to sound out thoroughly each new aspirant to Congress as to his attitude toward the Government employee.

The National Federation of Federal Employees is massing its full strength to procure a friendly Congress. Not only will it blacklist certain Members of Congress, but every effort will be made to have every employee in the Government service exercise his full voting right.

To encourage voting among nonresident employees in Washington, the federation is completing data on election laws, election dates, and other information relative to every State in the Union, which can be handily gotten by calling at the headquarters of the federation.

I simply wanted to read that to the committee, so that Members would know just exactly the attitude they are occupying in reference to this legislation.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. What document is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. SISSON. This is a news item appearing in one of the Washington papers.

Mr. KING. What paper?

Mr. SISSON. The Washington Times.

Mr. KING. Is there any proof that this comes from the employees?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely none, as I stated before; but if that is not true, it ought to be denied. I do not believe that the employees of the Federal Government should in this manner endeavor to hold up Congress.

Mr. WALSH. What does the gentleman expect to accomplish by throwing such a scare into the membership here?

Mr. SISSON. I apologize to my friend for thus throwing Congress into a panic.

Mr. WALSH. Is not the passage of this bill endangered by any such assertion?

Mr. SISSON. I waited till the bill passed before calling attention to this threat upon our political lives. I did think that the attitude of the employees should be known in Congress, however, and throughout the country, so that we could arrange all the affairs of the Nation for the benefit of these employees. I presume most of the Members of Congress desire that the Federal employees shall receive fair treatment, and I am sure that our committee has endeavored to give them fair treatment, but the mental attitude of these people ought to be known. These people propose to defeat every Member of Congress who does not agree to take from the taxpayers of America every cent that they demand. In other words, they propose, if this article tells the truth, to take charge of the next election and defeat every man who refuses to yield to their mandates. Every voter and taxpayer in America should understand this matter and be informed as to what their servants, the Federal employees, are demanding. I trust that only a few employees feel this way about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman wait until we get through with this measure.

Mr. UPSHAW. But this relates to this very matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to address the committee for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 65 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to return to page 65 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of lines 22, 23, 24, and 25, on page 65.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentelman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 65, strike out all of lines 22, 23, 24, and 25, as follows:
"For salaries of the officers and employees in the various Subtreasuries from July 1 to December 31, 1920, inclusive, or to such earlier date as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine, at annual rates of compensation, as follows."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am utterly unwilling for this hour to pass without going on record concerning this matter. I want to say to you I am in favor of the bonus for Federal employees brought forth in the report of the committee, and I am in favor of more than that bonus and would be glad to see it increased—listen—not because I am afraid of any threat that has been published or not published——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. UPSHAW (continuing). But because I am in favor of doing the right thing for these Government employees. [Applause.] And I want to say this——

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. I make the point of order that the distinguished gentleman from Georgia is not discussing anything that is now before the committee, and he is talking out of order, in that this matter has been passed, and I ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia will proceed in order.

Mr. UPSHAW. I say to the gentlemen of this House that we men who are drawing $7,500 a year for the service we are rendering, faithful as it is, hard as it is, ought not to try to stop any kind of legislation that will give men of families who are working just as hard as we are a pittance of $1,500 or $1,600 a year. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. UPSHAW. I know many men——

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. UPSHAW (continuing). Who can not support their families on what they are getting.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. UPSHAW. I have many letters, sir——

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. UPSHAW. From many men who declare that they will have to quit work for the Government and that their families are suffering because they are not getting enough to live on in these trying times.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman can not proceed when a point of order is raised.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas state his point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the distinguished gentleman from Georgia ought to obey the rules when his colleague makes a point of order. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Georgia is proceeding out of order in disobedience to the Chair's ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman that the item to which the amendment to strike out was offered is relative to the salaries of officers and employees of the bureaus of the Subtreasuries. The gentleman will confine his remarks to that subject.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I remind the House I have on my desk many letters from noble patriotic men whose lives I have touched for years who declare that they love their Government and its work, but who tell me they will be compelled to leave the service soon if their salaries are not increased——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. UPSHAW. They are connected with the Subtreasury or the main Treasury. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the distinguished gentleman from Georgia should keep within the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will admonish the gentleman from Georgia to obey the rule.

Mr. UPSHAW. The gentleman from Georgia accepts the admonition from the Chair and would emphasize the assertion now that the thing I am trying to do is to connect these faithful servants of the Government, not so much with the Subtreasury but with the main Treasury of the American people. [Great applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman withhold his motion? The Chair is informed by the Clerk——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do. My attention is called to the fact that these subsequent paragraphs have not been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that certain paragraphs in reference to the subtreasuries have not been read.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is what I wished to call attention to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Baltimore, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,500; paying teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $1,900; exchange teller, $1,800; vault clerk, $1,800; clerks—2 at $1,600 each, 3 at $1,400 each, 3 at $1,200 each, 3 at $1,000 each; messenger, $840; 3 watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $15,750.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to strike out?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; it should not be stricken out, as I understand it, for the reason that the Platt amendment provides for the continuance of these offices for a year, and these salaries ought to remain the way they are in order that the gentlemen interested may get their salaries.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The provision which was struck out was because of the fact that we limited the salaries to six months. Now, all that is necessary is for the totals to be corrected.

Mr. IGOE. The total given to this Subtreasury, as I understand, provided in the bill for only six months?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We instructed the Clerk some time ago to correct the totals.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking if it is understood that the Clerk is authorized to increase the totals of these items to cover the entire year?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. When was it that consent was given? Does that follow by striking out the paragraph at the bottom of the previous page?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words in order to ask the chairman of the committee if the bonus applies to these salaries?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is not any bonus.

Mr. BAER. It would have been provided if it had been carried in the bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BAER. I think it ought to be carried in the bill. Is not there some way to amend this bill so that it can carry the bonus?

The Clerk read the remainder of the items.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12610) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

Mr. EAGAN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. That will come in due time.

The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the Green amendment, providing for $40,000 for the legislative-drafting bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, strike out lines 15 and 16 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"The salaries and expenses of maintenance of legislative drafting service as authorized by section 1343 of the revenue act of 1918, $40,000, one-half of such amount to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and one-half by the Clerk of the House of Representatives."

Mr. BLANTON. I also ask for a separate vote on the amendment placing back in the bill the surveyors-general legislation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The question now recurs on the amendment relating to the legislative drafting service.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no quorum present.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let us stay. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] can get his dinner to-morrow.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from New York need not have any dinner.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] moves that the House adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 122, noes 41.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. CALDWELL. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. If I make the point of order that no quorum is present, will that require a roll call?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KING. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] are absent on official business.

The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is detained by illness in his family, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is absent on account of the death of a member of his family.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] in attendance at the funeral of the late Senator BANKHEAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senate is in open executive session, and the question is upon the amendment proposed to the sixth reservation by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let us have a roll call on the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] proposes the following amendment to reported reservation No. 6:

On lines 11 and 12 strike out the words "between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I wish to say a word about the amendment presented by the Senator from Massachusetts. It seems to me that there has been so little said about it that it is not very well understood, to judge from the remarks I have heard here. If the pending reservation were amended as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts it would read as follows:

The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles.

And there it stops. When formerly considered by the Senate the reservation included the words "between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have moved to strike out those last words.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, I understand; that is what I am trying to say. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is to strike out those words.

Mr. LODGE. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So the reservation would withhold the assent of the United States to the three sections named and reserve to the United States full liberty of action.

Mr. President, I should like to know what possible good can arise as a result of the United States withholding its assent to these three articles? The three articles simply contain an agreement by Germany that she turns over to Japan what she has heretofore held in the Shantung Peninsula as the result of a lease from the Republic of China. Japan has conquered that leasehold and holds possession of it to-day, probably to a greater extent than Germany ever held. What good do we do for China by refusing our assent to the articles by which Germany relinquishes her claim?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand the amendment before the Senate now is to strike out the few last words. It does not change the reservation except in that respect, and we are not now about to vote on the reservation itself but simply on the amendment. Does the Senator object to striking those words from the reservation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No, I do not; I should like to strike more words from the reservation; but I am trying to point out the folly of the reservation. I suppose there is some purpose in putting it in there. What possible purpose is it? What benefit does China derive out of it if Germany is prevented from turning over the rights which she has heretofore held there? As a matter of fact, it is an idle proceeding. The treaty has already been ratified by Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan. The Japanese title derived as the result of the war has already been indorsed and approved by those countries. Japan has possession, and our withholding our assent to Germany's assignment makes no change in the situation. It does China no good.

What possible motive can there be for a reservation which effects nothing? Is there any doubt that Japan has possession? Is there any doubt that the other nations which are parties to this treaty have assented to it? Is there any claim that our refusal to give our assent to Germany's transfer is to be of any value to China? If we were to attempt to benefit China, the proper stand for us to take would be a declaration that we propose to hold Japan to the promises which she has made by her representatives, first in Paris and later from a number of other sources, that it was her intention to turn this property over to China at some time in the future. The exact time has not been named, but I believe the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has demonstrated pretty well in his remarks made in the Senate heretofore that if we accepted the restrictive provisions of the Japanese promises we would have a hold upon Japan that would enable us in the future to bring pressure to bear on Japan to compel her to carry out her promises. If we, however, refuse assent to this assignment, we have no hold on Japan; there would then be no consideration for the promises which Japan made to the United States to secure our assent.

In my opinion, in making this reservation we not only do an idle thing which can be of no possible benefit to China or any other country, but we relinquish whatever hold we had on Japan as the result of the promises which were wrung from her in consideration of having that section put into the treaty.

I merely want to have the situation understood. I propose to vote for the amendment and then against the reservation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will tell the Senator from Nebraska what this reservation does. I regard it as doing something of very great importance. It relieves the United States from being an active and assenting participant in that which a majority of the Senate and a vast majority of the American people consider an infamy and a crime. That is what this reservation that the Senate agreed to by a large majority means.

I am not going to go back and argue the whole Shantung question. I argued it in the summer to the best of my ability, and it was most thoroughly discussed by the senior Senator from Nebraska, and has been dealt with as fully as possible. I do not want to delay a decision by debate. The change that was made was the modification suggested in the bipartisan conference, and I understood it, and we all understood it, as the desire of the Democrats who took part in that conference.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator takes his seat let me ask what is the object in striking out those words?

Mr. LODGE. The object is simply because it was thought to be more civil not to mention Japan by name.

Mr. REED. It does not change the meaning?

Mr. LODGE. Not one iota.

Mr. REED. I am led to this thought by the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska. He stated that Japan has promised or has given a qualified promise to turn this property back; and he also indicated, if I understood him correctly, that he thought if we took the proper position we might have some influence in bringing about that very much-to-be-desired result. Would the Senator from Nebraska support an amendment to the Lodge reservation stating, in substance, this: "The United States understands that the Government of Japan has agreed to and will transfer these properties to China"?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, Mr. President; I should be glad to support such a suggestion, and I believe it would yield a great deal more protection to China than the pending reservation, which does nothing at all of benefit to China.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am encouraged. I wish the Senator would offer such a reservation; but if he will not offer it, I shall myself be obliged to do so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not hear all of the interrogation of the Senator from Missouri; but permit me to ask whether the reservation which I have offered—I do not read it textually—does not meet the suggestion which he made:

The United States understands that the German rights and interests renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty are to be returned by Japan to China within a reasonable time after the adoption of said treaty, as provided in the exchanged notes between the Japanese and Chinese Governments under date of May 25, 1915.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will allow me just a moment, the Senator from Utah misapprehends the purpose of this reservation. As originally adopted by the Senate it was not to express any understandings about what Japan meant or what anybody else meant; but it was to put on record the refusal of the United States to assent to the deal by which Shantung was going to be handed over to Japan.

Mr. KING. I think I understood the purpose of it; but it seemed to me that the Senator from Missouri, if I understood him aright, was willing to approve of a reservation which expressed the view that in assenting to the treaty with respect to this matter it was with the understanding that these possessions were to be transferred, or retransferred, to use his expression, by Japan to China.

Mr. REED. I am not sure, Mr. President, that I understand the Senator from Utah or that he quite understands me. The proposition I make is that we allow the Lodge reservation to stand as it is, the United States refusing to become a party to the transaction, but adding to the Lodge reservation language similar to that read by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the defect of such a proposition. We can not at the same time hold Japan to a promise given in consideration of these articles and refuse to assent to the articles.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We assent to the articles in consideration of the promise, and then we shall have a hold on Japan. The reason that Japan was willing to give us the promise was in order to secure the assent of the United States to the articles. Now, if we refuse the assent we can not hold her to the promise.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Nebraska says the reason Japan was willing to give the promise was in order to gain our assent. Where is the evidence of that? Where has Japan evidenced that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have it not at hand, but the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has repeatedly put it into the RECORD in speeches made by him. I think he demonstrated beyond a doubt that the representatives of Japan in Paris offered the President of the United States, as an inducement to agree to these articles, that they would promptly turn over the property to China after the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President, I do not know of any such evidence as that. I heard some of the speeches of the Senator from North Dakota, and I do not think he arrived at that point, except by a very strong draft on the imagination as to what Japan might or might not do. Now, I put it to the Senator from Nebraska—and it is possible that his mind and mine might come to an agreement on one thing——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit an interruption here, I should like to read him the reservation which the Senator from North Dakota presented. It read as follows:

5. That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty the United States understands that the German rights and interests, renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty, are to be returned by Japan to China at the termination of the present war by the adoption of this treaty as provided in the exchanged notes between the Japanese and Chinese Governments of date May 25, 1915.

Mr. President, there is some objection—and I explained that to the Senator from North Dakota—to mentioning the notes exchanged between the Chinese and the Japanese Governments, for this reason: Those notes are claimed by Japan to constitute a treaty, and the State Department of the United States has served notice upon Japan that it would not recognize that treaty. So I doubt whether it would be wise for the Senate of the United States in this formal way to recognize it. It seems to me it would be much better for the reservation to read something like this:

5. That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty the United States understands that the German rights and interests, renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty, are to be returned by Japan to China at the termination of the present war by the adoption of this treaty, as repeatedly represented and promised by the representatives of Japan in China and elsewhere.

Mr. BORAH. Why not stop with the words "are to be returned by Japan to China"? That makes a complete statement. The moment you go into the question of the exchange of notes, and so forth, you get into the modifications and differences of understanding, not only between Japan and China but even between the President of the United States and the representatives of Japan.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should not have any objection to that; that would be something substantial for the benefit of China; but, Mr. President, the pending reservation is of no benefit to China. Japan is in possession; Germany has no title. We are here protesting against something that has already occurred; it is an accomplished fact. It is of no benefit to China unless we are going to back up our protestations by active means.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the difference between the Senator from Nebraska and myself is this: He proposes first to ratify, confirm, and assent to the transfer of Shantung to Japan, and thus drive the United States actively to participate in that transfer. He then proposes to rely upon a statement by the United States that it understands that Japan will return these properties. I am not willing that the United States shall assent to, ratify, and confirm this ravishment of China. I am unwilling that we shall do that even for a moment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. I should like to finish the statement, and then I will yield. But what we can do, if we wish to do it, is to say, as the Lodge reservation says, that the United States withholds its assent to that transfer, and, in addition, that it understands Japan has agreed to turn this property back, and that the United States proposes, so far as it can by a mere reservation of this kind, to indicate that understanding of the United States and place it solemnly of record. There is nothing inconsistent about that, and that is the course I hope the Senator from Nebraska will consent to follow; that is, to allow the Lodge reservation to stand, by which we wash our hands of any complicity in this crime, at the same time expressing our judgment and insistence that this alleged contract shall be carried out.

Now, just one word further: The Senator has referred to statements made by the Japanese representatives at the peace conference and elsewhere; but the trouble is that Japan has never officially made a binding representation upon this question—never in the world. Certain Japanese statesmen are now alleged to have said certain things, to have given certain interviews, but that does not bind Japan. It would be quite a different question if the Japanese Government bound itself to return this property by a solemn engagement, and the only way that could properly be done would have been for them to have added to articles 156, 157, and 158 some such words as these: "Japan hereby solemnly pledges herself to return these properties to China, and to do so within a fixed period or a reasonable period of time." I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that if the resolution now proposed by the Senator from Nebraska should be adopted it would be based upon something that is not true, because it is not claimed that any Japanese statesman at the peace conference ever made a promise that all of the property and all of the rights in Shantung obtained from Germany would be turned over to China. It was only the sovereignty that was in question; the economic rights, President Wilson understood as a part of the agreement, would be retained by Japan.

Mr. REED. Just at this point—and when I have made this observation I shall take my seat—I recently heard an address by a gentleman who had been sent by trade organizations, entirely nonpolitical in their character, to investigate conditions in Shantung. He asserted that the Japanese were practically excluding from the trade of Shantung the business of all other countries except Japan; that while upon the face of affairs it appeared that all nationals had equal rights, the Japanese, being in control of the instrumentalities of commerce and in general control of the country, were able to place the nationals of other countries at such disadvantage that their trade was being taken away from them. He illustrated the condition by a statement of fact, which was that when a Chinese merchant ordered goods, if he ordered them from a Japanese citizen he could get an immediate delivery over the railroad, but if he ordered from an American or an Englishman, for some reason or other cars could not be obtained or cars were delayed and the deliveries were held up. He earnestly insisted that unless we did something at once the trade of that country would be lost. So we have a very serious interest in this matter aside from any idealistic interest or concern. I take it, however, that the Senator from Nebraska and I can not agree, because he is not willing to have the Lodge reservation stand and add as an amendment the proposition made by me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to what the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] said regarding this particular reservation. I have quoted the Senator from North Dakota as being opposed to that particular reservation, and he states his reasons here in an address delivered in the Senate on August 26, in which he said:

Mr. President, on last Saturday, three days ago, the Committee on Foreign Relations, by a majority of one, voted an amendment to articles 156—

That was regarding an amendment. I am mistaken. The speech did not refer to the reservation; it refers to the amendment.

Mr. REED. Of course, the speech of the Senator from North Dakota might be illuminating, but I want some documentary proof that Japan had agreed to turn this property back to China.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, all I desire to say about this amendment is this: The Democratic members of the bipartisan conference proposed an amendment to the Shantung reservation striking out the words "between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan." All of the Republican members assented to it, and agreed to recommend it to their associates in the Senate. Now, if Senators on the other side wish to carry that understanding out and to have the reservation amended as the bipartisan conference agreed, well and good. I am willing to vote for every single amendment that was agreed to in that conference; but if, after voting this amendment in, they undertake then to defeat the reservation entirely, I shall certainly reserve to myself what action I will take on the remainder of them. I want the Senate to understand the situation and the country to understand it. If they wish to carry out in absolute good faith the understanding in regard to amendments, well and good; I am willing to vote for every one of them.

I shall not go into the Shantung question again. The reservation on that subject was adopted because, as I remember, not a single Senator stood upon this floor and defended the Shantung deal, and I believe that scarcely anyone in the country defended it, if anyone. The President himself did not defend it; and I, for one, shall refuse to vote to place the stamp of approval of the United States Senate upon it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the subject matter of this reservation originally crystallized itself into an amendment proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations which substituted "the Republic of China" for "the Empire of Japan" wherever the name of the latter occurred in articles 156, 157, and 158. That amendment was rejected, and I think properly so, by the Senate. I voted against its acceptance because I regarded the subject matter as beyond our power to dispose of. Japan's possession of Shantung was obtained by force of arms prior to our entry into the war; and some time afterward, by secret treaties between herself and the Allies, she was guaranteed possession and title to all that Germany had in that Province in the event the Allies were successful in the then existing war, and articles 156, 157, and 158 are the embodiment of those secret treaties in the treaty now under consideration.

As the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has well said, nobody has defended this part of the treaty. It has been condoned, it has been explained, it has been palliated, but in America it has not been justified or championed by anyone. Hence, for the United States to attempt to amend the treaty by assuming to dispose of Shantung, not to Japan but to China, was to identify ourselves with the controversy in a manner that in my judgment was not warranted by our position.

The reservation avoids that objection completely, and merely declares that we withhold our assent to these articles, which, of course, means that we wash our hands entirely of the controversy. If Great Britain, France, and Italy, bound by their secret treaties with Japan with which we had not identification, feel obligated to stand by and carry out their provisions, they have a perfect right to do so. To ask us to take sides in any way is, in my judgment, premature.

So this reservation addressed itself with peculiar force to my judgment. I think it is the proper method of disposition of the matter, so far as we are concerned, and I can not but regard the motion to strike out all after the word "articles," in the eleventh line of page 3, as an improvement upon the reservation as it was originally adopted.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did I understand the Senator to say that he thinks the proposed amendment of the reservation is an improvement?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I think it is an improvement. As stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], it eliminates all mention of Japan, and I am glad to see that; but it also gives us full liberty of action with reference to any controversy which may arise under the articles, although other powers than China and Japan might become involved. In other words, it gives us full liberty, not only as regards the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan, but as regards all aspects of controversy which may be developed in the course of time regarding this important question.

I shall, therefore, support the motion to strike out, and I shall also support the reservation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator, so far as the amendment now before the Senate is concerned, he feels that it constitutes an improvement. The improvement consists merely of the manner of expressing the same thing?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; but I think it goes a little further. As the reservation was originally framed, we reserved full liberty of action with respect to any controversy that might arise between those two countries. That probably is broad enough to refer to all controversies, but there may be controversies regarding it growing out of the treaty relations between the Allies and Japan or between them and China. Hence, I think it is an improvement not only with regard to the elimination of all reference to Japan and China, but also as to the elimination of any possible restriction upon our liberty of action in the future.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, just a word regarding the tentative agreement that was reached.

While it is true that such an agreement was reached, it is only fair to say that all of those agreements were considered as tentative only, and not binding upon any of the parties. It is true that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] then was entirely willing to accept this reservation if the modification that is now pending was adopted; but it must be remembered that at that time the Senator from Nebraska was engaged, with others, in an endeavor to come to some agreement for the ratification of the treaty, and his changed attitude is very easily explained when we realize that now the Senator from Nebraska is making no effort to secure a ratification of the treaty, but his efforts are altogether along the line, in conjunction with the irreconcilables, of defeating it. So now the Senator from Nebraska says that although this amendment be adopted he will vote against the reservation, and he gives as his reason that the adoption of the reservation could do no possible good to China, or in any wise affect the situation.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand an article written by Prof. John Dewey, of Columbia University, who is now in China, and whose article entitled "Shantung, as seen from within," appears in the current number of the New Republic. I wish to quote one paragraph from that article in reply to the Senator from Nebraska. He says:

> Whatever the motives of the American Senators in completely dissociating the United States from the peace settlement as regards China, their action is a permanent asset to China, not only in respect to Japan, but with respect to all Chinese foreign relations. Just before our visit to Tsinan, the Shantung provincial assembly had passed a resolution of thanks to the American Senate. More significant is the fact that they passed another resolution to be cabled to the English Parliament, calling attention to the action of the American Senate and inviting similar action. China in general, and Shantung in particular, feels the reenforcement of an external approval. With this duplication, its national consciousness has, as it were, solidified. Japan is simply the first object to be affected.

It seems to me that is a complete answer to the statement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]; and because this article is so full of information in regard to the Shantung situation down to the present date, I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New Republic, Mar. 3, 1920.]

SHANTUNG, AS SEEN FROM WITHIN.

I.

"American apologists for that part of the peace treaty which relates to China have the advantage of the illusions of distance. Most of the arguments seem strange to anyone who lives in China even for a few months. He finds the Japanese on the spot using the old saying about territory consecrated by treasure spent and blood shed. He reads in Japanese papers and hears from moderately liberal Japanese that Japan must protect China as well as Japan against herself, against her own weak or corrupt Government, by keeping control of Shantung to prevent China from again alienating that territory to some other power.

"The history of European aggression in China gives this argument great force among the Japanese, who for the most part know nothing more about what actually goes on in China than they used to know about Korean conditions. These considerations, together with the immense expectations raised among the Japanese during the war concerning their coming domination of the Far East and the unswerving demand of excited public opinion in Japan during the Versailles conference for the settlement that actually resulted, give an ironic turn to the statement so often made that Japan may be trusted to carry out her promises. Yes; one is often tempted to say that is precisely what China fears, that Japan will carry out her promises, for then China is doomed. To one who knows the history of foreign aggression in China, especially the technique of conquest by railway and finance, the irony of promising to keep economic rights while returning sovereignty lies so on the surface that it is hardly irony. China might as well be offered Kant's Critique of Pure Reason on a silver platter as sovereignty under such conditions. The latter is equally metaphysical.

"A visit to Shantung and a short residence in its capital city, Tsinan, made the conclusions which, so far as I know, every foreigner in China has arrived at, a living thing. It gave a vivid picture of the many and intimate ways in which economic and political rights are inextricably entangled together. It made one realize afresh that only a President who kept himself innocent of any knowledge of secret treaties during the war could be naïve enough to believe that the promise to return complete sovereignty, retaining only economic rights, is a satisfactory solution. It threw fresh light upon the contention that at most and at worst Japan had only taken over German rights, and that since we had acquiesced in the latter's arrogations we had no call to make a fuss about Japan. It revealed the hollowness of the claim that pro-Chinese propaganda had willfully misled Americans into confusing the few hundred square miles around the port of Tsingtau with the Province of Shantung with its 30,000,000 of Chinese population.

"As for the comparison of Germany and Japan, one might suppose that the objects for which America nominally entered the war had made, in any case, a difference. But, aside from this consideration, the Germans exclusively employed Chinese in the railway shops and for all minor positions on the railway itself. The railway guards (the difference between police and soldiers is nominal in China) were all Chinese, the Germans merely training them. As soon as Japan invaded Shantung and took over the railway, Chinese workmen and Chinese military guards were at once dismissed and Japanese imported to take their places. Tsinan, the inland terminus of the ex-German railway, is over 200 miles from Tsingtau. When the Japanese took over the German railway business office they at once built barracks, and to-day there are several hundred soldiers still there, where Germany kept none. Since the armistice, even, Japan has erected a powerful military wireless within the grounds of the garrison, against, of course, the unavailing protest of Chinese authorities. No foreigner can be found who will state that Germany used her ownership of port and railway to discriminate against other nations. No Chinese can be found who will claim that this ownership was used to force the Chinese out of business or to extend German economic rights beyond those definitely assigned her by treaty. Common sense should also teach even the highest-paid propagandist in America that there is, from the standpoint of China, an immense distinction between a national menace located halfway around the globe and one within two days' sail over an inland sea absolutely controlled by a foreign navy, especially as the remote Nation has no other foothold and the near-by one already dominates additional territory of enormous strategic and economic value, namely, Manchuria.

"These facts bear upon the shadowy distinction between the Tsingtau and the Shantung claim, as well as upon the solid distinction between German and Japanese occupancy. If there still seemed to be a thin wall between Japanese possession of the port of Tsingtau and usurpation of Shantung, it was enough to stop off the train in Tsinan to see the wall crumble, for the Japanese wireless and the barracks of the army of occupation are the first things that greet your eyes.

"Within a few hundred feet of the railway that connects Shanghai, via the important center of Tientsin, with the capital Peking, you see Japanese soldiers on the nominally Chinese street, guarding their barracks. Then you learn that if you travel upon the ex-German railway toward Tsingtau, you are ordered to show your passport as if you were entering a foreign country. And as you travel along the road (remembering that you are over 200 miles from Tsingtau) you find Japanese soldiers at every station, and several garrisons and barracks at important towns on the line. Then you realize that at the shortest possible notice, Japan could cut all communications between southern China (together with the rich Yangtz region) and the capital, and with the aid of the Southern Manchurian Railway at the north of the capital, hold the entire coast and descend at its good pleasure upon Peking.

"You are then prepared to learn from eyewitnesses that when Japan made its 21 demands upon China, machine guns were actually in position at strategic points throughout Shantung, with trenches dug and sandbags placed. You know that the Japanese liberal spoke the truth, who told you, after a visit to China and return to protest against the action of his Government, that the Japanese already had such a military hold upon China that they could control the country within a week, after a minimum of fighting, if war should arise. You also realize the efficiency of official control of information and domestic propaganda as you recall that he also told you that these things were true at the time of his visit, under the Terauchi cabinet, but had been completely reversed by the present Hara ministry. For I have yet to find a single foreigner or Chinese who is conscious of any difference of policy, save as the end of the war has forced the necessity of more caution, since other nations can now look Chinaward as they could not during the war.

"An American can get an idea of the realities of the present situation if he imagines a foreign garrison and military wireless in Wilmington, with a railway from that point to a fortified seaport controlled by the foreign power, at which the foreign nation can land, without resistance, troops as fast as they can be transported, and with bases of supply, munitions, food, uniforms, etc., already located at Wilmington, at the seaport, and several places along the line. Reverse the directions from south to north, and Wilmington will stand for Tsinan, Shanghai for New York, Nanking for Philadelphia with Peking standing for the seat of government at Washington, and Tientsin for Baltimore.

"Suppose in addition that the Pennsylvania Road is the sole means of communication between Washington and the chief commercial and industrial centers, and you have the framework of the Shantung picture as it presents itself daily to the inhabitants of China. Upon second thought, however, the parallel is not quite accurate. You have to add that the same foreign nation controls also all coast communications from, say, Raleigh southwards, with railway lines both to the near-by coast and to New Orleans. For—still reversing directions—this corresponds to the position of Imperial Japan in Manchuria with its railways to Dairen and through Korea to a port 12 hours' sail from a great military center in Japan proper. These are not remote possibilities nor vague prognostications. They are accomplished facts.

"Yet the facts give only the framework of the picture. What is actually going on with Shantung? One of the demands of the 'postponed' group of the 21 demands was that Japan should supply military and police advisers to China. They are not so much postponed but that Japan enforced specific concessions from China during the war by diplomatic threats to reintroduce their discussion, or so postponed that Japanese advisers are not already installed in the police headquarters of the city of Tsinan, the capital city of Shantung of 300,000 population, where the provincial assembly meets and all the provincial officials reside. Within recent months the Japanese consul has taken a company of armed soldiers with him when he visited the provincial governor to make certain demands upon him, the visit being punctuated by an ostentatious surrounding of the governor's yamen by these troops. Within the past few weeks 200 cavalry came to Tsinan and remained there while Japanese officials demanded of the governor drastic measures to suppress the boycott, while it was threatened to send Japanese troops to police the foreign settlement if the demand was not heeded.

"A former consul was indiscreet enough to put into writing that if the Chinese governor did not stop the boycott and the students' movement by force, if need be, he would take matters into his own hands. The chief tangible charge he brought against the Chinese as a basis of his demand for 'protection' was that Chinese storekeepers actually refused to accept Japanese money in payment for goods, not ordinary Japanese money at that, but the military notes with which, so as to save drain upon the bullion reserves, the army of occupation is paid. And all this, be it remembered, is more than 200 miles from Tsingtau and from eight to twelve months after the armistice. To-day's paper reports a visit of Japanese to the governor to inform him that unless he should prevent a private theatrical performance from being given in Tsinan by the students, they would send their own forces into the settlement to protect themselves. And the utmost they might need protection from was that the students were to give some plays designed to foster the boycott.

"Japanese troops overran the province before they made any serious attempt to capture Tsingtau. It is only a slight exaggeration to say that they 'took' the Chinese Tsinan before they took the German Tsingtau. Propaganda in America has justified this act on the ground that a German railway to the rear of Japanese forces would have been a menace. As there were no troops, but only legal and diplomatic papers with which to attack the Japanese, it is a fair inference that the 'menace' was located in Versailles rather than in Shantung, and concerned the danger of Chinese control of their own territory. Chinese have been arrested by Japanese gendarmes in Tsinan and subjected to a torturing third degree of the kind that Korea has made sickeningly familiar. The Japanese claim that the injuries were received while the men were resisting arrest. Considering that there was no more legal ground for arrest than there would be if Japanese police arrested Americans in New York, almost anybody but the pacifist Chinese certainly would have resisted. But official hospital reports testify to bayonet wounds and the marks of flogging. In the interior where the Japanese had been disconcerted by the student propaganda they raided a high school, seized a schoolboy at random, and took him to a distant point and kept him locked up several days. When the Japanese consul at Tsinan was visited by Chinese officials in protest against these illegal arrests, the consul disclaimed all jurisdiction. The matter, he said, was wholly in the hands of the military authorities in Tsingtau. His disclaimer was emphasized by the fact that some of the kidnaped Chinese were taken to Tsingtau for 'trial.'

"The matter of economic rights in relation to political domination will be discussed in part 2 of this article. It is no pleasure for one with many warm friends in Japan, who has a great admiration for the Japanese people as distinct from the ruling military and bureaucratic class, to report such facts as have been stated. One might almost say, one might positively say from the standpoint of Japan itself, that the worst thing that can be charged against the policy of Japan in China for the last six years is its immeasurable stupidity.

"No nation has ever misjudged the national psychology of another people as Japan has that of China. The alienation of China is widespread, deep, bitter. Even the most pessimistic of the Chinese who think that China is to undergo a complete economic and political domination by Japan do not think it can possibly last, even without outside intervention, more than half a century at most.

"To-day, at the beginning of a new year, the boycott is much more complete and efficient than in the most tense days of last summer. Unfortunately, the Japanese policy seems to be under a truly Greek fate which drives it on. Concessions that would have produced a revulsion of feeling in favor of Japan a year ago will now merely salve the surface of the wound. What would have been welcomed even eight months ago would now be received with contempt. There is but one way in which Japan can now restore herself. It is nothing less than complete withdrawal from Shantung, with possibly a strictly commercial concession at Tsingtau and a real, not a Manchurian, open door.

"According to the Japanese-owned newspapers published in Tsinan, the Japanese military commander in Tsingtau recently made a speech to visiting journalists from Tokyo in which he said: 'The suspicions of China can not now be allayed merely by repeating that we have no territorial ambitions in China. We must attain complete economic domination of the Far East. But if Sino-Japanese relations do not improve, some third party will reap the benefit. Japanese residing in China incur the hatred of the Chinese. For they regard themselves as the proud citizens of a conquering country. When the Japanese go into partnership with the Chinese they manage in the greater number of cases to have the profits accrue to themselves. If friendship between China and Japan is to depend wholly upon the Government it will come to nothing. Diplomatists, soldiers, merchants, journalists should repent the past. The change must be complete.' But it will not be complete until the Japanese withdraw from Shantung leaving their nationals there upon the footing of other foreigners in China.

II.

"In discussing the return to China by Japan of a metaphysical sovereignty while economic rights are retained, I shall not repeat the details of German treaty rights as to the railway and the mines. The reader is assumed to be familiar with those facts. The German seizure was outrageous. It was a flagrant case of might making right. As Von Buelow cynically but frankly told the Reichstag, while Germany did not intend to partition China she also did not intend to be the passenger left behind in the station when the train started.

"Germany had the excuse of prior European aggressions, and in turn her usurpation was the precedent for further foreign rape. If judgments are made on a comparative basis, Japan is entitled to all of the whitewashing that can be derived from the provocations of European imperialistic powers, including those that in domestic policy are democratic. And every fair-minded person will recognize that, leaving China out of the reckoning, Japan's proximity to China gives her aggressions the color of self-defense in a way that can not be urged in behalf of any European power.

"It is possible to look at European aggressions in, say, Africa as incidents of a colonization movement. But no foreign policy in Asia can shelter itself behind any colonization plea. For continental Asia is, for practical purposes, India and China, representing two of the oldest civilizations of the globe and presenting two of its densest populations. If there is any such thing in truth as a philosophy of history, with its own inner and inevitable logic, one may well shudder to think of what the closing acts of the drama of the intercourse of the West and East are to be. In any case, and with whatever comfort may be derived from the fact that the American continents have not taken part in the aggression, and hence may act as a mediator to avert the final tragedy, residence in China forces upon one the realization that Asia is after all a large figure in the future reckoning of history. Asia is really here after all. It is not simply a symbol in western algebraic balances of trade. And in the future, so to speak, it is going to be even more here, with its awakened national consciousness of about half the population of the whole globe.

"Let the agreements of France and Great Britain made with Japan during the war stand for the measure of western consciousness of the reality of a small part of Asia, a consciousness generated by the patriotism of Japan backed by its powerful army and navy. The same agreement measures western unconsciousness of the reality of that part of Asia which lies within the confines of China. An even better measure of western unconsciousness may be found perhaps in such a trifling incident as this: An English friend long resident in Shantung told me of writing indignantly home concerning the British part in the Shantung settlement. The reply came, complacently stating that Japanese ships did so much in the war that the Allies could not properly refuse to recognize Japan's claims.

"The secret agreements themselves hardly speak as eloquently for the absence of China from the average western consciousness. In saying that China and Asia are to be enormously significant figures in future reckonings, the specter of a military yellow peril is not meant nor even the more credible specter of an industrial yellow peril. But Asia has come to consciousness, and her consciousness of herself will soon be such a massive and persistent thing that it will force itself upon the reluctant consciousness of the west and lie heavily upon its conscience. And for this fact China and the western world are indebted to Japan.

"These remarks are more relevant to a consideration of the relationship of economic and political rights in Shantung than they perhaps seem. For a moment's reflection will call to mind that all political foreign aggression in China has been carried out for commercial and financial ends and usually upon some economic pretext. As to the immediate part played by Japan in bringing about a consciousness which will from the present time completely change the relations of the western powers to China, let one little story testify. Some representatives of an English missionary board were making a tour of inspection through China. They went into an interior town in Shantung. They were received with extraordinary cordiality by the entire population. Some time afterwards some of their accompanying friends returned to the village and were received with equally surprising coldness. It came out upon inquiry that the inhabitants had first been moved by the rumor that these people were sent by the British Government to secure the removal of the Japanese. Later they were moved by indignation that they had been disappointed.

"It takes no forcing to see a symbol in this incident. Part of it stands for the almost incredible ignorance which has rendered China so impotent, nationally speaking. The other part of it stands for the new spirit which has been aroused even among the common people in remote districts. Those who fear, or who pretend to fear, a new Boxer movement, or a definite general antiforeign movement are, I think, mistaken. The new consciousness goes much deeper. Foreign policies that fail to take it into account and that think that relations with China can be conducted upon the old basis will find this new consciousness obtruding in the most unexpected and perplexing ways.

"One might fairly say, still speaking comparatively, that it is part of the bad luck of Japan that her proximity to China, and the opportunity the war gave her to outdo the aggressions of European powers, have made her the first victim of this disconcerting change. Whatever the motives of the American Senators in completely disassociating the United States from the peace settlement as regards China, their action is a permanent asset to China, not only in respect to Japan but with respect to all Chinese foreign relations. Just before our visit to Tsinan the Shantung Provincial Assembly had passed a resolution of thanks to the American Senate. More significant is the fact that they passed another resolution to be cabled to the English Parliament, calling attention to the action of the American Senate and inviting similar action. China in general and Shantung in particular feels the reenforcement of an external approval. With this duplication, its national consciousness has, as it were, solidified. Japan is simply the first object to be affected.

"The concrete working out of economic rights in Shantung will be illustrated by a single case which will have to stand as typical. Po-shan is an interior mining village. The mines were not part of the German booty; they were Chinese owned. The Germans, whatever their ulterior aims, had made no attempt at dispossessing the Chinese. The mines, however, are at the end of a branch line of the new Japanese-owned railway—owned by the Government, not by a private corporation, and guarded by Japanese soldiers. Of the 40 mines the Japanese have worked their way, in only four years, into all but 4. Different methods are used. The simplest is, of course, discrimination in the use of the railway for shipping. Downright refusal to furnish cars while competitors, who accepted Japanese partners, got them, is one method. Another more elaborate method is to send but one car when a large number is asked for, and then when it is too late to use cars, send the whole number asked for or even more, and then charge a large sum for demurrage in spite of the fact the mine no longer wants them or has canceled the order. Redress there is none.

"Tsinan has no special foreign concessions. It is, however, a 'treaty port' where nationals of all friendly powers can do business. But Po-shan is not even a treaty port. Legally speaking, no foreigner can lease land or carry on any business there. Yet the Japanese have forced a settlement as large in area as the entire foreign settlement in the much larger town in Tsinan. A Chinese refused to lease land where the Japanese wished to relocate their railway station. Nothing happened to him directly. But merchants could not get shipping space or receive goods by rail. Some of them were beaten up by thugs. After a time they used their influence with their compatriot to lease his land.

Immediately the persecutions ceased. Not all the land has been secured by threats or coercion; some has been leased directly by Chinese moved by high prices in spite of the absence of any legal sanction. In addition, the Japanese have obtained control of the electric-light works and some pottery factories, etc.

"Now, even admitting that this is typical of the methods by which the Japanese plant themselves, a natural American reaction would be to say that after all the country is built up industrially by these enterprises, and that though the rights of some individuals may have been violated there is nothing to make a national, much less an international, fuss about. More or less unconsciously we translate foreign incidents into terms of our own experience and environment, and thus miss the entire point. Since America was largely developed by foreign capital, to our own economic benefit and without political encroachments, we lazily suppose some such separation of the economic and political to be possible in China. But it must be remembered that China is not an open country. Foreigners can lease land, carry on business, and manufacture only in accord with express treaty agreements. There are no such agreements in the cases typified by the Po-shan incident. We may profoundly disagree with the closed economic policy of China, or we may believe that under existing circumstances it represents the part of prudence for her. That makes no difference. Given the frequent occurrence of such economic invasions, with the backing of soldiers of the imperial army, with the overt aid of the imperial railway, and with the refusal of imperial officials to intervene, there is clear evidence of the attitude and intention of the Japanese Government in Shantung.

"Because the population of Shantung is directly confronted with an immense amount of just such evidence it can not take seriously the professions of vague diplomatic utterances. What foreign nation is going to intervene to enforce Chinese rights in such a case as Po-shan? Which one is going effectively to call the attention of Japan to such evidences of its failure to carry out its promise? Yet the accumulation of precisely such seemingly petty incidents, and not any single dramatic great wrong, will secure Japan's economic and political domination of Shantung. It is for this reason that foreigners resident in Shantung, no matter in what part, say that they see no sign whatever that Japan is going to get out; that, on the contrary, everything points to a determination to consolidate her position. How long ago was the Portsmouth treaty signed and what were its nominal pledges about evacuation of Manchurian territory?

"Not a month will pass without something happening which will give a pretext for delay and for making the surrender of Shantung conditional upon this, that, and the other thing. Meantime the penetration of Shantung by means of railway discrimination, railway military guards, continual nibblings here and there will be going on. It would make the chapter too long to speak of the part played by manipulation of finance in achieving this process of attrition of sovereignty. Two incidents must suffice. During the war Japanese traders with the connivance of their Government gathered up immense amounts of copper cash from Shantung and shipped it to Japan against the protests of the Chinese Government. What does sovereignty amount to when a country can not control even its own currency system? In Manchuria the Japanese have forced the introduction of several hundred million dollars of paper currency, nominally, of course, based on a gold reserve. These notes are redeemable, however, only in Japan proper. And there is a law in Japan forbidding the exportation of gold. And there you are.

"Japan itself has recently afforded an object lesson in the actual connection of economic and political rights in China. It is so beautifully complete a demonstration that it was surely unconscious. Within the last two weeks Mr. Obata, the Japanese minister in Peking, has waited upon the Government with a memorandum saying that the Foochow incident was the culminating result of the boycott; that if the boycott continues a series of such incidents is to be apprehended, saying that the situation has become 'intolerable' for Japan and disavowing all responsibility for further consequences unless the Government makes a serious effort to stop the boycott. Japan then immediately makes certain specific demands. China must stop the circulation of handbills, the holding of meetings to urge the boycott, the destruction of Japanese goods that have become Chinese property—none have been destroyed that are Japanese owned. Volumes could not say more as to the real conception of Japan of the connection between the economic and the political relations of the two countries. Surely the pale ghost of 'sovereignty' smiled ironically as he read this official note. President Wilson, after having made in the case of Shantung a sharp and complete separation of economic and political rights, also said that a nation boycotted is within sight of surrender. Disassociation of words from acts has gone so far in his case that he will hardly be able to see the meaning of Mr. Obata's communication. The American sense of humor and fair play may, however, be counted upon to get its point.

"JOHN DEWEY.

"PEKING, January 5, 1920."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have so often and at such length addressed the Senate on the subject that is now before it that it would be cruel for me to impose myself further upon the Senate on this subject. I had not intended to say anything; but since there has been so much discussion upon it, I can not leave the subject without making just a few further remarks.

It seems that some Senators on this side and some Senators on the other side, including my colleague [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the leader on the other side, have been having various conferences—I presume, like the Versailles conference, they were secret conferences; they could not well be otherwise, having such a noble example just before them—with a view of reaching an agreement on some of these reservations. It appears now, from what Senators say on the floor of the Senate, that the leader on the other side has lost his spirit, and is not carrying out in good faith some of these secret agreements. I can only say to the Senators on this side that they ought to reread the story of "Old Dog Tray."

It is now contended that while the pending amendment, striking out a few words, ought to be adopted, the reservation itself ought to be rejected; and the reason given by my colleague, the leader on the administration side of this contest, is that it ought to be rejected because it does not help China.

China has a new recruit, a new friend coming to her defense. Nobody knows better than China that she is praying her god that she will not have many such friends. A great many things have been done in the history of the world against China, but certainly I hope that after she has been so many times afflicted she will not be persecuted by having added to her torments much of that kind of friendship.

Personally, I do not care very much whether the pending amendment is agreed to or not. It will not change the reservation. I believe the reservation has considerable merit in it and will do considerable good of a moral nature. It does not satisfy me. This new friendship for China, if it had existed when we had the treaty under consideration before, would perhaps have gotten some votes for the amendment that struck out of the treaty these most disreputable and, in my judgment, dishonorable articles.

I am going to vote for this reservation, as I did before, Mr. President, not because I am satisfied with it, not because I think it does what we ought to do, but because I would rather have half a loaf than no bread.

China was one of our allies. Her loyalty has never been questioned. You can not say that of another ally that is getting the major portion of the graft in this treaty. You can not say that, in other words, of the Empire of Japan. She fought valiantly until she got what she wanted, and that was about the end of her sacrifices. But, be that as it may, no one has questioned the loyalty of China. No one has questioned the fact that China went into the war mainly because the American Government went into the war. She was our friend; she was one of the Allies; she did everything that was asked of her. She lost more than 100,000 of her citizens on the battle field. She was practically denied admission to the peace conference, where her own throat was cut and where by these articles in the treaty everything that was sacred and dear to her was taken away from her and given to her worst enemy. In all the history of the world there is not, in my judgment, a more shameful treatment of a friend and ally than is this instance of China as she is treated in this treaty. We ought, it seems to me, to reject the treaty until all the possessions of the former German Empire in China are restored to China.

It is said here this morning that Japan already has possession. That is true. We have possession of some of the German Empire now. Our soldiers are encamped along the Rhine. We took on the battle field parts of Alsace and Lorraine at the sacrifice of American lives and American blood. Did anybody ever say in behalf of America that we would retain possession of what we had gained on the battle field against the common enemy until we were ready to turn it over to somebody else?

Mr. President, we are saying by these reservations that whilst our ally and our friend and the ally and friend of the balance of the Allies, our brethren in this war, are mistreated, their territory and their nationality and millions of their people in effect taken away and turned over to their ancient and present enemy, we wash our hands of it. I concede that that is better than to affirmatively participate in it, but that is what we are saying by this reservation. I think we are going back on our own ally, and doing it when, in my judgment—and I think the evidence before the Foreign Relations Committee disclosed it—it is absolutely unnecessary for us to do it. We could just as well have protected the rights of China at the Versailles conference, or even here, if we had taken the right step, as we could pass the reservation which I presume we are going to adopt.

Something was said yesterday about what Japan is doing now. Something was said to-day about her promise to return Shantung and the balance of this property to China. She has never officially promised to return it, and everybody knows that she will not return it except on conditions that she fixes and that are satisfactory to her. If she wants to return it in good faith, she ought to have been out of it long ago. If she was acting in good faith in her promise to return it made at Versailles and that incidentally and unofficially has been made since by some of her statesmen, why does she not pack up again and go home? That is all she has to do. Everybody is willing that she should go. No one is holding her back.
